So what am I to say? I could take the easy way out and tell everyone to "Do Something!" and take action and sign petitions like madmen and run down the street with banners and chants. That will show we care! Yeah hoo! We'll "take back!" the country just like Pat Buchanan wanted his folks to do. We'll take it back, write new rules, and leave all the old folks in charge so it will go back to being exactly the same with new, fancy slogans.

No. Because the problem is exactly that. We have all been so completely drained of any passion, that we even believe that social change can come from fifteen minute sound bytes and maybe some intimidation to get a few concessions. It is like patching a hole with a piece of tape. We think we can save the arts by just giving it money. We can save the poor by just giving them money. We can save the world by just giving it money. Or, in turn, we can save the world by blowing up all the bad folks. Easy, simply, clean.

The problem is not them, it is us. We are them. We have kids that become them. We have friends that are them. And who them are, are tinker toy people who do not know who they are, or what they want, or what they think, or what they care about, because they watch T.V. and smile at the commercials and go to their jobs and make their money and maybe yell at their kids a bit and buy lots of stuff and maybe get stoned and go to the mall because then they can have another little ready-made reality to make them happy without effort. Oh, it is all so fun and easy!

Then when them gets angry at the world because it is not the way they want it, they blame all the other thems and maybe will smash their windows, or fight to take their funding away, or protest in the street, or perhaps will just hop around their rooms and punch the wall and take another drink. Then they can feel a little better, and go back to being just another them.

We do it all because we have nothing else to do. There is no passion inside, there is no loyalty to anyone, and most of all there is no caring for anybody or anything, because there is no caring, and there is no love, for ourselves.

So when I go to these old restaurants, there are ghosts that haunt the place. They sit in corners and cry, because all that they had produced and all of themselves that they had put into the walls, is falling apart, and giving into the bright new shiny boxes of McDonald's that spring up beside them. We have produced nothing but long strips of highways with plastic buildings and plastic people, to make plastic food and plastic products to sell to all of us, and eventually to all the world, so that one day the culture of any country can be mass-produced in a factory or a television studio for ease and convenience.

I wish I could change it all with a shout and a lecture, but I would be lying to myself. It takes more than that, but we have all grown too old, and have all grown too lazy. I truly believe that if the end were to come, and was hovering over our heads waiting to drop, we would be sitting in our living rooms drinking a Coke and watching television, hoping that the verdict comes out before we die.

What else do we know how to do, after all? Cry?

Ha.

The rollercoaster of relationships

Chinedu Ogbuike

Relationships are crazy things. Like a rollercoaster, you never know where the next turn will take you, or when the ride will end.

Many things come to mind when men and women are together, but nobody seems to know what anyone else wants or needs. Love, trust, respect and commitment are a few of the essential things that make relationships work.

Love is important because everyone deserves to be loved. It's also blind. Both men and women need love for comfort and guidance. Bad relationships result in people becoming skeptical about future ones, but they still need love. People just need time to get over previous relationships before starting new ones. Better communication between men and women could result in better relationships. They must be open about their feelings, and need to trust each other.

Love comes from the heart, so forget what people tell you and follow your instincts, because they may help you find the one. Rumors can potentially damage relationships, so find out the truth before making any decisions.

Trust is important because everyone has some good in their hearts. Men and women should trust each other so there is a feeling of security between them. In relationships, trust is built over time; however, it is also very easily damaged. Men and women need to be open and trusting so that their partner will understand. Couples seem to hide feelings and information from each other to the point that their problems escalate.

It is better to get things on your mind out of the way before the relationship starts to break down. If you can't trust somebody, how do you expect them to trust you in return? Couples need to avoid prejudging each other and allow their partners to live their lives. Assuming your partner is up to no good requires truth and evidence because a wrong assumption can lead to negative feelings.

Men: don't worry about what your woman is doing she will tell you openly, if she feels comfortable with you. Women: you need to stop worrying about your man's whereabouts because he is still coming back home to you. It also takes an untrustworthy person sometimes to know one.

Respect is another important factor in a relationship. Men and women have to treat each other with respect, there is no getting around it. That means respecting intelligence, privacy, separate interests and most importantly, respecting each other's feelings. In an equal relationship, both partners must have the same amount of respect for each other.

Commitment is the final important part of a relationship because it helps produce a security blanket feeling. The thought of promiscuous activity going on outside the relationship is in the back of the minds of couples. Partners committed to each other usually think of the other and want to engage in sexual activities only with that person. If there is satisfaction in the relationship, both people will remain committed and have little thoughts of fooling around.

Stereotypically, some men and women are looking for others to commit to them, which is difficult if some are not ready for a commitment. Some men and women want to experience life a little more and the pressures of a relationship are not on their minds at the moment. That does not mean that they will never commit themselves, it just means that time is needed to think about it more.

However, it is not good to be force commitment, because the results could devastating. You may not be very happy, you may become promiscuous, and other problems could arise. People in a committed relationship must be willing to make some sacrifices. A relationship in which two people commit to each other requires a lot of time to be spent with their partners.

Every rollercoaster ride is different. Some last longer than others and some boast more thrilling rides. They take your breath away, but we all line to ride again.

Public should shun media blitz

Tara Ruelle

I usually try not to buy into the idea of hero worship or idolatry. Every now and again though I get sucked into the media frenzy of what we consider a celebrity. This happened to me with the legacy of Reggie Lewis. I let myself believe in a public figure that the media created.

Though sports heroes are a dime a dozen something struck me about this man. His achievements as a successful sports star were greatly overshadowed by the much-needed charity work he did in the surrounding communities of Boston. It encouraged me to see someone praised for his work off of the court rather than on.

Another aspect about this man that impressed me was that after he died the media let him die with dignity. The press exonerated this man by focusing on the positives in his life — his work. This is a rare occurrence in the press, because there always seems to be some scarlet letter a public person has to bear. His death was not clouded by rumors fueled with hatred, though. His life was celebrated and remembered. However, our media later took a different approach to this story. Scandal-hungry vultures were biding their time waiting for the right moment to swoop down on an unsuspecting widow and an easily led public.

I shook my head in disgust as news of a Wall Street Journal article tarnishing the character of Lewis surfaced in the local press. I was never shocked by the appearance of this trashy piece, but was disappointed that a newspaper held in such high regard would stoop to print a highly sensational, tabloidesque sample of journalism. What was more disheartening was the reaction of some of the kids Lewis tried to help. Their faces looked emotionless on the television screen. The same people who fed these kids with the right to care about Lewis, suddenly expected them to respond to the rumors they had circulated about him.

The Wall Street Journal only started the frenzy. Other forms of media propelled the scandal as more and more rumors filled the ears of the public. I never thought about believing or not believing the hype, I only felt sickened that these allegations surfaced so long after he died, but soon enough to cost him his reputation. The press' free-for-all has continued now moving on to press conferences and interviews with Lewis' widow, expected to explain away the charges to reassure the questioning fans.

The only people to be free of allegations and doubts are the very people who created the scandal, the guilt-free press. They will be allowed to make and break people as long as we succumb to their ever-changing coverage of the heroes they create. I feel that they should be held accountable for the scandals they fuel, not the families and fans they attack. We need to question the news they print than the people they expose a lot more. I choose not to question the validity behind the allegations aimed at Lewis and, rather, choose to disdain the press that pulled the chair out from under the hero they molded.

How far can the press go, and how far can they extract a person's character without owing some explanation or facing up to some responsibility to a naive public? Thus far they have been able to pass the buck for accountability to public figures they focus in on for news coverage. They have become accustomed to building up a person and simultaneously making them fall down.

There seem to be no visible ethics involved only the revenue drawn in by a faster selling paper. We should face up to our own part in this problem, we created the monster and now it's time to tame it. We need only be more aware and skeptical of a media blitz. The public should not expect the press to care about people. They care about the story. Their headlines may only last one day but the impact can last a lifetime. It's time to care less about the bold letters on the front page and more about the substance inside.

Letters to the Editor

Terrorists should not be praised

To the editor:

We are writing on behalf of a group of British students here at UMass, who were outraged at the pro-terrorist views expressed by Dave Gleeson in the Collegian of March 17.

Does Mr. Gleeson expect reasonable people to "... raise a glass to Bobby Sands ... "? If we're going to do that we might as well just raise our glasses to the IRA. "Here's to terrorism and the murder of innocent people." We could even have one for the bombers of the Pan Am jet over Lockerbie. In fact why not just drink to anyone who has ever used terror to further their political beliefs?

It is ill-informed views like Mr. Gleeson's, echoed by many so called "Irish-Americans," that have helped to fuel the troubles in Ulster. Furthermore, with peace in sight for the first time in nearly eighty years, the expression of opinions like these is not only infuriating but downright irresponsible.

The troubles have been a source of pain for Ireland and the United Kingdom for too long but real progress is now being made. If Americans, Irish or otherwise, can learn to mind their own business, the progress will continue and true peace will at last be a reality.

Contract cuts important grants

To the editor:

Newt Gingrich and his Republican Contract on America are taking aim at higher education. They want to drastically cut most government programs that help students to afford college. Newt has told the American public that it is insulting to students to offer tuition grants and loan interest subsidies because it implies that we are lazy. He says that we should work our way through college.

Newt has spoken out against all grant programs, which probably means that the days of the Pell Grant are numbered. Students with Stafford loans or GSL's will have to start paying the interest on their loans from the day that they sign it, instead of the government paying for the interest until they leave college.

The average UMass student with financial aid borrows almost $5,000 per year in educational loans. Can you afford the interest on that sum with the job that you have now? You won't have a choice if Newt triumphs. If not, McNewt has McJobs in abundance waiting just for you after you are forced to drop out.

The Republicans want middle America to stay under- educated. An under-educated America can't see through what they are heaping on this country day after day. Under Newt's administration, only the wealthy will be able to afford a college education, and without a college education we will all be stuck in low-paying service-oriented jobs. Soon it will be only those who are wealthy and well- educated who will be running this country. Whose interest do you think that they will be looking out for? They didn't get that way by looking out for the lower and middle classes. The only people who are going to help us is us.

UMass should still repay Amherst

To the editor:

The answer to Mr. Pavesi's whiny question "When will this parking ticket issue ever end?" is simple: When UMass pays Amherst the money it legally and ethically owes us, the issue will die.

Speaking as the Town Meeting member who submitted the warrant article calling for a lawsuit against UMass over the parking ticket money, I, too, am frustrated. Mr. Pavesi's stale argument is that the money went for a "good cause" (student scholarships) and therefore requires no reimbursement is naive.

The money did not rightfully belong to the University and should be repaid — period! Mr. Pavesi also feels the town would not use the repaid money to "fund services which directly benefit students living within the community." Wrong.

This year our Fire Department/Ambulance, which provides services that directly benefit students living on and off campus, will cost Amherst homeowners $2 million. At an average cost of $6,000 per child, UMass Grad students living in tax-exempt housing will cost Amherst taxpayers $1 million this year in elementary school costs.

State Senator Stan Rosenberg, who has always championed UMass funding, commissioned a study that shows, all economic things considered, UMass costs Amherst about $3 million annually.

Yes, "Bright Momenta," the Mullins Center, and the Fine Arts Center contribute economically and culturally to the town. But they too are funded by the state and federal money, not to mention admission charges picked from the pockets of Amherst workers.

Would Amherst be "just another farm town" without UMass? We would still have large employers. But still, Amherst and UMass need each other. Rather than futilely running up a legal bill, also paid by taxpayers, UMass should simply do the right thing. Pay up, so Mr. Pavesi and I can shut up.

Examining MTV & Lollapalooza

Liner Notes
Compiled by Matt Audette
and Justin Faerber

We have finally reached the end of civilization as we know it — and it has diabolically come in the form of "MTV Spring Break." ("It's a moment — it's a Spring Break moment..." — I love that.)

Remember when the world's premiere music video network actually showed — music. Now we have been assaulted by a barrage of ultra–hip nonsense (yet entertaining nonsense) such as "The Real World," "Dead At 21" and "Beavis and Butt–Head." But the culmination of all this drivel arrived last week went the channel presented its yearly Spring Break extravaganza set in Arizona.

In case you happened to miss this year's festivities (don't worry they will be repeated ad nauseam for the next three weeks), "MTV Spring Break" is basically an excuse for thousands of unruly college students to act as moronic as humanly possible, while our favorite MTV personalities rival their stupidity by hosting various thought–revoking shows.

Of course there are many of today's "hottest" musical acts scattered throughout in order to remind you that this is a music channel, lest you forget.

This year's lucky participants included teenage sensation; Brandi, flavor–of–the moment, The Dave Matthews Band; and Spring Break mainstays Naughty By Nature (winners of the "Arizona, are you ready to party?" award).

The problem with all this Spring Break nonsense is that it is just that — nonsense.

The programs that MTV offered this year were horrendous (especially the X–rated dating game rip–off "Singled Out"), not to mention there were only about four of them repeated over and over and over.

Sure all our favorites were back such as "Beauty And The Beach" and "The Grind" (it has been confirmed: Eric Neis is the most annoying person walking on the planet at this moment) but do we really care anymore?

I know that we don't usually look to MTV for stimulating programming, but this time around the station has really hit rock bottom. Maybe they should try something different, like showing music videos. Imagine that.

With the fifth annual Lollapalooza festival set to kick off in just a few short months, speculation as to who will be performing is higher than ever. Although, as of now, there have been no definite confirmations from Perry Farrell and company, submitted for your approval: some more grist for the Lollapalooza rumor mill.

According to a source close to the event, Snoop Doggy Dogg, Hole and Cypress Hill have already been offered spots on the bill, and other artists on Farrell's with list range from predictably dull (The Offspring, Weezer) to refreshingly promising (The Jesus Lizard, PJ Harvey) to downright far–fetched (Pagan).

The prospects for the headlining spot look particularly dim. Since Neil Young bailed out to work on his collaboration album with Pearl Jam, the front–runners are a highly–unanticipated Clash reunion or Stone Temple Pilots. Remember when Lollapalooza was a showcase for non– platinum–selling, MTV–hugging acts?

Unless you've been tied up in a closet for the last week or so, you've probably heard about the upcoming Sonic Youth/Dinosaur Jr. double–bill at Amherst College. Although the show isn't until April 28, it would be highly recommendable to get your (admittedly overpriced) tickets now for their only U.S. performance together. A show like this comes along about as often as a Lou Barlow pays J Mascis a compliment.

In other concert news — pack up the car and get ready to make a road trip or two to Providence, RI for a couple of stellar shows at Lupo's Heartbreak Hotel. This Thursday, alterna–pop favorites Belly will be returning to their home state for their first local live performance in over a year. With indie–rock icons Superchunk opening the show, how can you go wrong?

Fugazi will also be coming to Lupo's for a two–night stint on April 11 and 12. If you've never seen these guys in concert, skip your night class to get there. If you've already seen them, then you don't need to be told.

Loud Music Fest hits NoHo

Versus, Helium, the Dambuilders highlight 3-day event

LOUD MUSIC FESTIVAL
March 30 — April 1
Northampton

While not always as "loud" as the title would suggest, this year's third annual Loud Music Festival was undoubtedly the Valley's concert event of the year so far.

With over 90 bands converging upon Northampton, the town was transformed into a plethora of musicians, business– suit–types and fans searching for the ultimate rock n' roll experience. In fact, for many attendees, the worst part of the event was having to decide just what shows to actually go see.

Pearl Street seemed like the place to be on opening night thanks to the buzz surrounding the two headlining acts Helium and Shudder To Think — but surprisingly it was some of the lesser–known opening bands made the most impact. Minnesota natives Polara put on a car–bashing set of psychedelic pop that recalled Smashing Pumpkins if Billy Corgan had grown up on the likes of Cheap Trick rather than the guitar heroics of Boston.

All things considered, Boston favorites Helium were easily the best performance of the evening. Led by singer/guitarist Mary Timony, whose haunting delivery only accented the band's spooky and dissonant pop. The band almost exclusively preformed songs from their startling full– length debut The Dirt Of Luck, keeping the audience mesmerized from start to finish.

Although not falling in the "loud" category what so ever, New York's Suddenly, Tummy! closed the evening off at the North Star with their quaint blend of bass, drums and piano. Despite some dorky in–between song banter, the band put on a perfectly executed set highlighted by Beth Sorrentino soaring vocals and delicate piano playing.

Unfortunately Friday night didn't quite have the star power of the previous evening, with many of the more anticipated acts putting in mediocre sets. The surprise of the night came from Japan's Sugar Plant who, in support of their debut album, delighted the Iron Horse crowd with their quirky stage presence and Galaxie 500 influenced melodies.

Disappointing sets were put on by indie–legends Scrawl, whose tepid folk disguised as rock style was admirable but underwhelming, and the Boston–based Fuzzy, who put on a "ho–hum" set of standard pop that borrowed heavily from bands such as Belly and The Breeders.

Despite all these big–name disappointments, The Dambuilders capped off the evening at Pearl Street with a blistering set of pop/rock that was driven by the band's manic energy and violinist Joan Wasserman's intense playing. The band blasted through a set of mostly new songs that culminated in a rousing rendition of "Louisiana" which found bassist Dave Derby hurling his bass across the stage — and it didn't even seem silly.

The highpoint of the festival was undoubtedly Saturday. Stellar performances from the early afternoon until well after midnight brought the three day extravaganza to a fitting close.

Led by singer/guitarist Richard Baluyut's furious, string– breaking intensity, Versus put on a truly inspired performance at the Iron Horse which was certainly the best of the entire festival. After the set, Baluyut joined fellow indie–rock legends Small Factory for a noisy rendition of their song "Expiration Date." Following such a powerful set by Versus, however, Small Factory's boyent harmonies came across as somewhat anti–climactic.

Other Saturday highlights included the mesmerizing, noise–drenched melodies of Boston's Syrup USA, the delicate indie–pop of Spent and an "interesting" performance ex– Misslon of Burma guitarist Roger Miller.

Arkansas, UCLA victorious

Razorbacks look to repeat, Bruins look to erase burdens

SEATTLE (AP) — One by one, they calmly flicked in free throws as if taking practice in an empty gym, except each of these shots in the clamorous Kingdome edged UCLA closer to its first NCAA championship in 20 years.

It was vintage UCLA, a poised and talented team taking over in the final few minutes, going on a 12-0 surge and sweeping into the title game against defending champion Arkansas with a 74-61 victory Saturday over Oklahoma State.

UCLA	74
Oklahoma St.	61

Instead of Gail Goodrich or Walt Hazzard or Mike Warren, there was tiny Tyus Edney spinning toward the hoop, going around the giant arms of 7-foot Bryant "Big Country" Reeves, and scooping in a layup.

And instead of Bill Walton or Sidney Wicks, there was Cameron Dollar hitting a pair of free throws, and Charles O'Bannon another pair, and Edney two more, and George Zidek two after that, and finally Dollar closing it out with the last two. Ten chances at the line, 10 points.

And by then the Cowboys could do nothing but stand in awe, like the rest of the Kingdome crowd, of a UCLA team that is back where it once belonged year after year.

Arkansas	75
North Carolina	68

"Sometime this summer it will hit me that we're playing for the championship," UCLA coach Jim Harrick said. "It's a great feeling, from where I've come from to where I am now."

For seven years, with humor and grace, Harrick carried the burden of John Wooden's legacy — 10 championships from 1964 to 1975 — and now with one more victory Harrick can shed himself of that weight. For the moment, he has the Bruins in their first title game since 1980, when a Larry Brown-coached squad lost to Louisville in the final.

Yet, for all their storied past and vaunted speed, the big-city Bruins struggled mightily before subduing the Cowboys from little Stillwater, Okla.

"I felt that if the game was close toward the end, we'd end up coming out victorious," Oklahoma State's Scott Pierce said. "There, at the end, the things that we relied upon, our defense and our shot selection, ended up failing us."

Oklahoma State was playing in its first Final Four since 1951. But with Reeves scoring 25 points and hauling down nine rebounds, the Cowboys threatened to win this game until UCLA went on its closing run.

Arkansas 75, North Carolina 68

SEATTLE (AP) — Nolan Richardson wants the world to know it takes more than luck to repeat as national champion. It takes a great player, great defense and sometimes even a wild buzzer-beater. Arkansas' 75-68 win over North Carolina on Saturday was the latest of their frantic finishes in the NCAA tournament and it moved them into Monday night's championship game against UCLA. It also gave the Razorbacks coach a chance to tweak those who keep calling his team lucky.

"You can't be lucky if you don't put yourself in a position to be lucky. In order to win championships you have to have luck," he said. "I just hope we have one more day of luck. Then you can write they were lucky again. They almost lost. I like that."

The Razorbacks (32-6) were able to joke about surviving because Corliss Williamson, the MVP of last year's Final Four, came up big in the second half and North Carolina, the champions just two years ago, came up empty shot after shot after shot in the second half.

Williamson was 9-for-12 from the field in the second half and scored all but two of his 21 points after halftime.

As Williamson heated up, the Tar Heels (28-6) went stone cold against the Razorbacks' swarming defense. They went 12:38 without a field goal at one point and had only one in the final 15 minutes. They finished the second half 6-for-24 from the field and never seemed to recover from Dwight Stewart's 55-foot heave at the halftime buzzer that cut North Carolina's lead to 38-34.

"In the first half some of my shots were kind of bad," Williamson said. "In the second half I did a pretty good job of posting up and my teammates caught me at the right times and I was able to turn around and score."

Richardson made sure of that.

"Corliss just wasn't getting enough touches and in the second half we made some adjustments," he said. "I told them either get the ball to him from time to time or come sit with me from time to time."

Stewart's buzzer-beater helped establish the momentum the Razorbacks rode in the second half.

BU Terriers capture National Title

By Tim Whitmire
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — For coach Jack Parker and his Boston University Terriers, it was a perfect reversal of fortune. A year after being trounced by Lake Superior State's second-period outburst in the NCAA title game, the Terriers turned the tables on conference rival Maine, building a 3-0 second period lead on their way to a 6-2 win and the fourth NCAA hockey title in school history.

BU	6

The triumph Saturday at the Providence Civic Center — site of BU's last national championship, in 1978 — ended 17 years of NCAA frustration which reached its peak with last year's 9-1 rout at the hands of the Lakers.

In that game, five second-period Laker goals helped turn a 1-0 contest into a 9-1 blowout, the widest margin of victory in a championship game in 33 years.

"Last year we had a great year, but I think we were just satisfied to get to the championship," BU captain Jacques Joubert said. "We didn't have the experience Lake State did."

The opening minutes of this year's championship looked like the prelude to a repeated nightmare. Maine (31-6-6), coming off an epic 4-3 semifinal win over Michigan in triple overtime Thursday, outshot BU 7-2 in the first 14 minutes and manhandled the Terriers on defense.

But the Black Bears tired. Boston University (31-6-3) outshot them 20-1 over the next 19 minutes, building a 3-0 lead on goals by Steve Thornton, Chris O'Sullivan, the tournament's most outstanding player, and Joubert.

Maine got a second wind, with goals by Tim Lovell and Trevor Roenick that closed the gap to 3-2 with 31 seconds gone in the third period. But BU clamped down defensively and secured the title with goals by Mike Sylvia, O'Sullivan and Bob Lachance.

"I didn't think anything could happen to us like it did last year," Parker said.

The win over the Black Bears was the first in five tries this season for BU. The Terriers tied their Hockey East rivals twice and lost twice in four regular season games played before Dec. 4. But BU rallied to tie the Black Bears for the league title in the last game of the regular season.

"We've been chasing them all year," Parker said.

The championship win put the Terriers back in a familiar place — atop the college hockey world.

The team won three titles in the 1970s, two under Jack Kelley and another under Parker, who took over in 1973-74. But BU slumped in the 1980s, qualifying for the NCAA tournament only twice. A disastrous 14-21-1 campaign in 1988-89 was Parker's second straight losing season.

The game was scoreless through two full innings of play until the Minutewomen got on the board with two runs in the top of the third. In the top of the seventh inning, the Minutewomen broke it open with three runs, helped by a two-run single from Martens. Cardenas had a solid opener, going 2-4.

Massachusetts 7, St. Joseph's 4

In the nightcap, Buckley hit a two-run homer to pace UMass. Ortega gave up nine hits in picking up her fourth victory of the season against six losses.

The Minutewomen scored two runs in each of the first two innings to jump out to a 4-0 lead. The lead would stay that way until the top of the fifth when UMass added two more runs to make it a 6-0 game. The Hawks got two runs of their own in the bottom half of the inning, making it 6-2.

The Minutewomen got their final run of the night in the top of the sixth inning. St. Joseph's stage one final rally in the bottom of the seventh, scoring two runs, but came up short.

Martens continued to pound the ball going 3-4 while driving in two runs.

which he delivered powerfully despite falling to the ground.

The Flying Dutchmen finally solved Tom LoPresti (10 saves) at 2:14, as Jacobs lifted a pass over the net to an awaiting Chris Panos on the doorstep.

UMass was not wanting for goals in the opening 18:17, scoring five, but in the next 19 seconds it added three more to clinch the contest well before halftime.

Hoffman made it 6-1 at 3:17, victimizing Spruyt with a 15-yard cannonball assisted by DelPercio.

At 3:26, Glass drew a crowd of defenders but found Murphy for his second of the night.

The third goal in this sequence was the prettiest. When UMass faceoff man Jay Robbins won a draw he was hard to stop. He sprinted past everyone and hit an open Glass on the left, and Glass shot the last ball Spruyt, carrying an amazing .684 save percentage into the game, would see. Kevin Johnson relieved the stunned sophomore.

"I think our offense controlled the ball in the first half, and at that point I think we could see what was going to happen," Murphy said.

The score remained 8-1 until Brian Langtry cut into the UMass lead with only three seconds left in the half, but this was no indication of a Minuteman demise.

Hofstra desperately needed to ignite its icy offense, but Kelly keyed a nearly seamless defensive display, well complemented by LoPresti's sharp work.

"This win's huge. It puts us in the top 10 right where we belong," LoPresti said.

The teams traded goals in the third quarter, with Jacobs scoring unassisted at 3:24 and Glass putting the finishing touch on his fifth career hat trick at 12:20 with a low, bouncing shot.

With just one quarter remaining and down by six, Hofstra could not allow UMass to answer each of its scores, but the Minutemen did just that. The Flying Dutchmen's Paul Judge converted the only extra man opportunity for either team at 1:25 from Jacobs, then cut it to 9-5 at 2:01, but Mike Valente netted his fourth at 9:51 and Stanziale got his first career goal 14:18.

Princeton and perennial power Syracuse.

While being shadowed by MacDonald, Knight finished with no goals or assists.

The defense has been led by seniors Jared Lanning, and Vinny Dello-Iacono, and has benefitted from the addition of junior Dennis Kelly.

Kelly has played well despite missing the entire season a year ago.

"My defense is unbelievable," LoPresti said, "the best defense in the country without a doubt. This is the best defense I've ever played behind."

The task gets no easier for UMass, as the Minutemen head to Durham on Wednesday to take on No. 6 Duke.

Cannella realizes that the defense will have to continue its success for UMass to compete with Duke.

"It's going to be a big trip for us," Cannella said. "There No. 6 in the country. We're going to go down there, play defense and play hard."

Men's lacrosse totally dominates Hofstra

■ Glass gets hat trick against Dutchmen as Minutemen roll

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y.— If the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team plays its remaining games as well as it did in grounding the Hofstra Flying Dutchmen, 11–5, Friday night at Hofstra Stadium, this may be a season to remember.

The No. 13 Minutemen led 4–0 after one quarter and Hofstra never got closer. Hofstra looked nothing like the undefeated, nationally eighth–ranked team it was before Friday evening's collapse.

"We're a whole new team," junior attack Eric Bailey (one goal, two assists) said. "We got a whole new concept on lacrosse, and things are rolling right now. I'm glad I'm on this train."

Massachusetts	11

Sophomore midfielder Chris Grande (nine goals last season) tallied his second of the year at 3:22, an unassisted overhand blast over Hofstra goaltender Mark Spruyt's right shoulder.

A defensive struggle ensued for much of the period, but UMass scored three goals in a span of 3:16 late in the quarter.

At 10:18, Bailey passed from a double team to Buddy Hoffman, who beat Spruyt with a wicked sidearm shot, Hoffman's third goal of the season.

Bailey took over the team lead in assists by setting up dangerous attacker Brendan Glass for the first of his three goals at 12:33.

Glass added an assist at 13:34 that allowed Jeremy Murphy to break in alone on Spruyt, faking the goalie well out of position for an easy goal, Murphy's team–high sixth.

"Getting off to a quick start was very important for us," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

Cannella substituted brilliantly all night, utilizing his defensive specialists each time Hofstra tried to cut into the lead. On offense, Mike DelPercio, Casey Costello and Henry Stanziale meshed flawlessly into Cannella's plan of attack.

UMass' defense thoroughly stifled Hofstra's vaunted attack, led by diminutive Kevin Jacobs, off his game for much of the night, as were many of his teammates. UMass committed few turnovers and executed a number of clever offensive sets, while Hofstra made many errant passes and played tentatively in the UMass goal area.

UMass went for the kill at the start of the second quarter, with Bailey scoring just eight seconds in from Hoffman. Bailey showed great concentration on his shot,

Consistent defense keys lacrosse's early success

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

HEMPSTEAD, NY — Before Friday night's matchup between No. 13 Massachusetts and No. 8 Hofstra, the buzz around the press box was about the Massachusetts offense.

The Long Island media and Duke scouts talked about sophomore Brendan Glass, senior Mike Valente, and the talented Minuteman midfield. When the game was over, the talk had shifted.

On the strength of the third straight impressive effort by its defense, Massachusetts had pounded Hofstra 11–5.

The Flying Dutchmen entered the game undefeated. In their three victories, including an upset of Brown, the Dutchmen had averaged 12 goals a game.

Before the season even started, Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella pointed to his defense as the key to the team's success.

His prediction proved correct, as the Minuteman defense confused and diffused the Dutchman attack.

"Our defense played superb as usual," Cannella said. "I think if we continue to play defense like that, we'll do fine."

The backbone of the Massachusetts defense is goaltender Tom LoPresti.

The senior from West Islip, New York, has been solid, and sometimes brilliant in net for the Minutemen in the first three games.

After giving up 13 goals to then No. 1 Virginia, the West Islip NY, native gave up only four goals against BC, and five against the talented Hofstra squad.

When Hofstra tried to mount a second half comeback, it was repeatedly frustrated by LoPresti who made 10 saves in the game.

LoPresti said although Hofstra was his best performance so far this season, he expects to have more good showings.

"I'm definitely pleased with my performance," LoPresti said. "I played my best game of the season so far, but there is more to come definitely."

From the start of the game, the Minutemen forced Hofstra out of its rhythm.

The UMass defenders were all over the Dutchman, forcing the home team to force shots and make bad passes.

The play of the defense allowed the Massachusetts offense to score in transition.

While senior Jeremy Murphy continued on his scoring spree, the team's leader in goals was quick to complement the team's defense.

"I'm very proud of our defense," Murphy said. "Tommy LoPresti was huge for us today. Tommy kept coming up big."

McDonald spent was assigned to shadow Hofstra's Kevin Jacobs, the Dutchmen's leading scorer.

Jacobs only found the net once, and it was while Jacobs was being covered by another Minuteman.

Jacobs is not alone.

Virginia's Doug Knight entered the UMass game with 18 goals in four games including a combined seven against defending champion

UConn finishes perfect season with NCAA title

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — With its final victory in a magical season, Connecticut achieved something rare in NCAA women's basketball — perfection.

Top-ranked Connecticut capped an unbeaten season by defeating No. 3 Tennessee 70-64 yesterday to win the national championship.

The Huskies (35-0) pulled it off despite the foul problems of their top three players and despite trailing by nine points early in the second half.

Only one other team has gotten through a season without losing in the 14 years of NCAA women's basketball.

Texas won the 1986 title with a 34-0 record.

Defense also was critical to the Huskies, who held Tennessee (34-3) without a field goal after Tiffani Johnson's three-point play put the Lady Vols ahead 61-59 with 4:09 left.

Jamelle Elliott hit a double-pump layup to tie the score at 61 with 2:20 to play and Jennifer Rizzotti's layup with 1:53 to play put Connecticut ahead 63-61.

The Huskies then wrapped up their first national title at the free throw line, with player of the year Rebecca Lobo making four and Rizzotti and Carla Berube sinking two apiece.

For the longest time, it appeared that Tennessee would fulfill the promise of a season that began with the Lady Vols ranked No. 1. The top-ranked spot was a position they held until losing to UConn 77-66 in mid-January.

Lobo, 6-foot-7 Kara Wolters and Rizzotti all got into foul trouble in the first half and spent long stretches on the bench.

But Connecticut played through its problems and sent Tennessee, a three-time national champion, back home as a frustrated loser.

After Berube made the first of her two free throws with 9.9 seconds left, Tennessee coach Pat Summitt slammed her hand down on the scorer's table and groaned, "I really hate this."

UMass pitching shines in sweep of St. Joseph's

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

They say good pitching will beat good hitting every time.

This weekend the University of Massachusetts baseball team proved that theory true, getting strong performances from their pitching staff in a three–game sweep of Atlantic 10 rival St. Joseph's in Philadelphia.

Senior Jay Murphy, the ace of the UMass staff, sparkled in the opening game on Saturday, allowing only two hits over seven innings as the Minutemen (10–6, 5–1 A–10) blanked the Hawks 5–0.

UMass jumped out on top early, scoring three runs in the top of the first, which was all their senior righthander would need. Murphy, who improved his record to 2–2, fanned 10 St. Joe's batters, while walking only three in the complete game shutout.

At the plate, the scoring punch came from senior first baseman Jeff Michaels, who knocked in a pair of runs, and junior shortstop Mark Pileski, who went 2–3 in the game.

Leadoff man and leftfielder Ryan Jette scored a run and drove one in, while freshman second baseman Muchie Dagliere plated a run with an RBI single.

Jed Johnson (4–4), who also went the distance, picked up the loss for the Hawks, whose record dipped to 10–17, 4–5 in the league, after the sweep.

In game two Saturday afternoon, UMass got another strong pitching performance from sophomore righty Chad Paronto.

Paronto (2–1) went the distance, giving up only five hits while striking out a pair and walking four in the 5–2 Minuteman victory. St. Joe's Steve Sala (1–3) suffered the loss, giving up all five UMass runs.

Senior rightfielder Bill Knight provided the big blows at the plate, hitting a pair of homeruns, his fourth and fifth of the season. Knight, who has cranked 29 career long balls, is now only three dingers shy of the UMass all time homerun record.

Knight drove in four while going 3–3 with a walk in the game, and has had two multiple homerun games this season.

In addition to Knight, designated hitter Nelson Ubaldo, who has been on fire at the plate all season, collected three hits in three trips to the plate, including a double. Jette picked up two more hits, while scoring a run and swiping a base.

UMass took game three Sunday afternoon 5–3.

Freshman righthander Scott Barnsby (2–1), who has been impressive so far this season in winning a spot in the starting rotation, picked up the win.

UMass returns to action Tuesday at UConn at 3:30 p.m.

Minutewomen sweep Owls, Hawks in A–10 softball action

By Andrew Bryce and Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The 11 losses that the Massachusetts softball team chalked up in 21 games heading into this past weekend were understandable, as the traditional early season non–conference schedule has great demands.

But the Minutewomen played four weekend games (two double–headers on Saturday and Sunday) which marked the start of the 1995 Atlantic 10 schedule. And with the 4–0 record coming out of the weekend's contests, sweeping St. Joseph's on Saturday and Temple on Sunday in two doubleheaders, Massachusetts lept over the .500 mark (14– 11, 4–0 in A–10).

Massachusetts 2, Temple 0

The Minutewomen recorded 11 hits, yet crossed home plate just two times. No matter, since senior pitcher Kelly Daut pitched seven innings of shutout ball on three hits. With the victory, Daut improved her record to 9–5.

The Minutewomen runs came in the second and third innings. The first run came as Kim Gutridge doubled and scored on a Daut single. In the third inning, Stephanie Mariena hit a single, and advanced to third on a Chris Martens single. Kelly Buckley then singled, knocking home Mariena. Buckley and Mariena each went 2–4, and Gutridge was 2–3.

Massachusetts 8, Temple 2

A six–run second inning barrage and a two–run seventh fueled the Minutewomen to their sweep of the Owls.

In the second inning, the Minutewomen scored their six runs on eight hits, including a Sam Cardenas double that knocked in three runs. Cardenas then supplied the two runs in the seventh on a two–run home run. The sophomore third baseman went 3–4. Junior Amy Powell also

UM, Hampshire students join together to help youth

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

In an effort to give back to the Amherst community, University of Massachusetts students of color have banded with their Hampshire College peers to help out local high school students.

A UMass–based student group called VIVA (Vitally Involved in Volunteer Action) has decided to focus their energies on potential dropout candidates at Amherst High School, most of whom are of Black or Latino origin.

Problems facing the adolescents include linguistic and cultural barriers, perhaps most notably due to a low number of faculty of color and the alienation felt by many in a predominantly White environment, according to VIVA representative Anne Lima, organizer of the pilot program.

Lima said the reason behind the high number of potential dropouts is the result of a school system in which students are automatically passed from junior high, regardless of their grades.

Thus, at the sophomore level, which commences the Amherst High curriculum, many are left ill–equipped to cope with the rigors of the academically well–regarded institution.

In response to the dilemma at hand, both UMass and Hampshire have made facilities on either campus accessible for various study and workshop activities, most of which are still in the planning stage.

Currently, workshop ideas on the table include pressing topics such as teen pregnancy, sexually transmitted diseases and AIDS.

Presently, the Shirley G. Du Bois Library in New Africa House has been chosen to serve as the center of after school homework sessions on Tuesdays and Thursdays.

Additionally, Hampshire has made both transportation and the use of its cultural center available.

"Basically, we want to tap into (the colleges') resources," Lima said.

However, aid is not only offered away from the Amherst High campus, as teaching assistants from both colleges will make regular visits to classes at the school.

VIVA's mission officially begins on Thursday at the high school, where collegiate and secondary level students will meet at 4 p.m. to enjoy pizza and refreshments.

"A lot of kids just fall into the cracks," Lima said. "As a community of color, we have a lot to offer."

At approximately 10:15 a.m. yesterday, about 25 students from the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), led by the Graduate Student Senate (GSS) President Prasad Venugopal, marched into Whitmore Administration building.

They demanded an immediate meeting with Chancellor David K. Scott to present him with a statement opposing the elimination of graduate assistantships.

The students, most of whom were TAs from different departments across campus, were told that the chancellor "would not be available" to meet with them even though he was in his office at that time.

However, the chancellor, who initially closed and locked his office door, later agreed to meet with the group who were standing outside his door and chanted slogans against impending budget cuts, and tuition and fee increases.

The statement presented by the group listed the planned $84 increase in mandatory tuition and fees and further reductions in departmental TA budgets as problems from the administration. They also listed continuing rent increases for graduate and family housing, and the administration's neglect of issues such as childcare needs and the harassment of foreign students on campus as proof of "a complete erosion of the University's commitment towards graduate research and education."

The statement, which listed the students' demands that there be no reductions in the TA budgets for 1995–96, was presented to the chancellor and Associate Chancellor Sue Pearson. Venugopal said, "this is only the beginning."

Scott responded to the demands by stating that they "did not have any idea of the budget projections for next year."

But, he said that decisions had to be made about reallocating money throughout the University to make up for a budget shortfall, as per President Michael K. Hooker's Action Plan.

At a student's suggestion that "maybe the best place to begin would be to abolish the president's office and his position," the chancellor laughed heartily along with the graduate students.

When asked about cuts to his own office, he responded by saying that he would be willing to consider a "half–time or one–fourth chancellorship."

"It is not just a question of economics but one of values," said Jeanine Maland, GEO staff member, about the budget cuts. "I do not believe that this is a public university anymore.

"The direction that the University is taking locks out the poor and working class families of this state who can no longer afford to attend, in order to satisfy a corporate agenda."

On the issue of rent increases and childcare, Scott said the administration would be looking into these problems, starting this summer.

Pearson also explained that the administration was conducting a survey of childcare needs across campus, along with GEO and the GSS.

However, Cecilia Rio, childcare coordinator for GEO, questioned the University's commitment to action, saying Pearson herself was unwilling to personally endorse the survey efforts.

The meeting ended with Venugopal admonishing the chancellor that he "cannot run with the rabbits and hunt with the hounds at the same time."

Sesame Street regular lectures on diversity

Loretta Long, commonly known to children across America as Susan spoke about multiculturalism in "Sesame Street" last night.

Before an audience of approximately 60 students, faculty and administrators, she said in 1969 the creators did something revolutionary, but simple: they researched what children enjoyed watching. The researchers discovered children liked short commercial like presentations.

When the show was created, it combined the quick sound bite sketches with a curriculum focusing on social conscience.

"The show was far ahead of the times because they were thinking of all the issues of multiculturalism back in the beginning of the program 25 years ago," said Chancellor David K. Scott.

Long brought with her numerous clips from episodes that have aired in the past five years which illustrated the social conscience theme of the show.

She pointed out to the audience one particular sketch which showed Bert teaching children the importance of chewing their food.

She said the sketch had an underlying focus on a little girl who had Down's syndrome. The goal of the show is not only to create children who are accepting of various cultures, but accepting of people with special needs.

In the past "Sesame Street" has focused on such social subjects as death and adoption. She explained with a slight tear in her eye about the episode explaining Mr. Hooper's death to Big Bird.

"I thought it was interesting how they dealt with concepts like death and adoption," said Nancy Blainey, a junior psychology major. "I learned about how children should be dealt with."

Scott said he would like to see

Shmuel Bolozky's "Arab and Israeli Literature in Translation" class will have two special speakers tomorrow.

Sami Michael and Salem Jubran, two Middle Eastern authors will be visiting the campus to speak on "Identity and Politics in an Inter–Racial State." They will speak in Bolozky's class at 11:15 a.m. in Herter 118, as well as a 4 p.m. lecture in the Campus Center.

According to Bolozky, the class is a comparative analysis of seminal works of modern Arabic and modern Israeli poetry and fiction.

"The idea was that we felt that there is a very important common cord that underlies both types of literature and pointing out this common cord and that social, political signs are the focus of both Arab and Israeli authors," Bolozky said. "The idea is to show the common cord and that the conflict does not mean that Israelis and Arabs can not communicate by means of art in general, and literature in particular."

Michael was born in Baghdad, Iraq in 1926 and was forced to flee

Sex education bill sent to state house

By Martin Finucane
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state Senate approved a bill Monday that would require schools to notify parents when sex education lessons are planned — and give parents a chance to pull their kids out of class.

The bill passed unanimously on a voice vote and was sent to the House.

"I think what it basically says is there are certain areas of the curriculum that are so sensitive that parents ought to be given notification," said Sen. David Magnani, (D-Framingham).

The bill, when it was initially proposed, drew criticism because it would have required notification for other subjects, including suicide, death and self-esteem.

But it was whittled down by Magnani's Education Committee last month to focus only on "heterosexuality, homosexuality, lesbianism, bisexuality, transvestitism, contraception, abortion or sexually transmitted diseases."

The Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts supports the amended bill, said spokeswoman Karen Hudner.

"We support the notion that parents should be given an opt out," said Hudner. "They really do need to be able to look at the curriculum themselves."

"Every good program that I know about allows parents ... to take their kids out," she said.

WASHINGTON — Without action, the Medicare hospital trust fund will go bankrupt in 2002 and Social Security's old age and disability funds will run out of cash in 2030, the programs' trustees told Congress Monday.

Both dates are a year later than previous forecasts. Despite the slight improvement in Medicare's short-term health, its long-term outlook "remains extremely unfavorable," the trustees said. They called for "prompt, effective and decisive action" to shore up the Medicare fund that pays hospital bills for 32 million elderly Americans and 4 million disabled workers.

But the trustees, including the secretaries of Treasury, Labor and Health and Human Services and the commissioner of Social Security, shied away from offering any specific remedies. They urged Congress to re-establish an advisory board to help chart Medicare's recovery.

The Medicare fund, under the latest forecast, will run out in 2002 — one year later than the trustees predicted last April. The precarious state of the fund "illustrates again the need for reform of the health care system to reduce the rate of growth in spending," HHS Secretary Donna Shalala said.

The separate Social Security old age and disability funds will last until 2030, one year later than the forecast of a year ago. All of the programs are in the red over the 75-year period covered in the trustees' report. Social Security Commissioner Shirley S. Chater said the long-range problems for the old age and disability funds must be fixed, "but we are not on the eve of a crisis."

Social Security is financed by a 6.2 percent payroll tax on employers and employees, and Medicare's hospital fund primarily by a 1.45 percent payroll tax.

Review to place priorities on campus repairs

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is planning a campus review to assess and prioritize needed building repairs.

University officials are in the process of writing a Request For Proposal (RFP) for an outside firm to conduct the review. The results from this review should be available by September 1996, said William Rose, associate vice chancellor for facilities and campus services.

The review will be used to obtain a complete and prioritized list of all campus repairs and more accurately assess the deferred maintenance backlog, Rose said.

The University's deferred maintenance backlog is now estimated to be $310 million according to another review issued by the independent Association of Higher Education Facilities.

He said this may be a conservative estimate and the current review may find the backlog to be much higher.

The review will start with the academic buildings in the center of the campus and move outward. It will assess each buildings condition and what needs specific components and systems need repair, Rose said.

"This will be a building by building, system by system review of the entire campus," he said.

According to him, the cost of this review is difficult to determine until each company offers their bid.

Once the review is completed, the University will be able to schedule maintenance goals giving higher priority to those systems found in higher need of repair. It will also allow the University to set long-term goals for the entire campus, Rose said.

In the meantime, the University has not and will not discontinue its attempts to combat deferred maintenance, he said. Buildings grossly in need of repair will get their needed renovations.

Such buildings such as the Fine Arts Center, the Munson Hall Annex and the New Africa House have had new roofing, asbestos removal, electric wiring replaced, repainting and re-carpeting as part of combating deferred maintenance.

A new co-generation plant is on the drawing board to replace the ageing power plant the University has currently. The current power plant has components more than 50 years old which make it obsolete and in need of replacement, the new associate vice chancellor said.

Newly elected Lopes ready to inherit SGA

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

Newly-elected Student Government Association (SGA) President Christine Lopes listened intently to former President Mirran Raphaely's suggestions yesterday as SGA members anxiously discussed upcoming political business.

Lopes, a sophomore pre-psychology and social thought and political economy major said she was excited to begin her first week as SGA president.

"I have always liked student advocacy," said Lopes, an Avon resident. "I think I can do a good job, and I am qualified enough to make a difference."

Lopes' experience includes campus organizer at the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) since fall '95.

Director of SCERA Marc Kenen said he is sad to see her go.

"While SCERA is very excited to have Christine as president, she will be sorely missed," he said.

Lopes wants to pursue politics as a second career, she said. She would like to first become a child psychologist specializing in sexual molestation cases.

"I like helping children with their problems — I just love children," she said. "My ultimate goal is to become Chief of Staff, later on in life."

Lopes has been meeting with Raphaely for about an hour each day, and will continue to do so for the next two weeks, in order to make her transition into the presidency a smooth one.

"We talk about files and phone calls, [Mirran] is helping me get used to the work, she is a good lean-on person," Lopes said.

Raphaely said she was pleased with the election and that Lopes would be an effective president.

"I am immensely proud, I have the utmost faith in her abilities," Raphaely said.

In order to begin action on their campaign slogan "Putting Students First," Lopes and running mate Dan Rivera have already begun to plan strategy.

"Besides trying to organize ourselves, Dan and I will be having meetings with administration over the next few weeks to set up student groups," Lopes said.

The groups include students, faculty and administration coming together to discuss negative and positive aspects of issues, she said.

The main focus is the fight for tuition and fees, however, Lopes said she has begun work on other issues mainly food services and academic advising.

Lopes and Rivera have spoken with the board of trustees and plan on meeting with the chancellor regarding academic advising service.

Quality, flexibility and hours of the dining commons are also being looked at, according to the new president.

"We want emphasis on those areas that affect students' lives."

Student acquitted in recent police assault trial

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student was found not guilty on charges of assault and battery on a police officer by a jury of six last Thursday.

Gerald Longardner, Jr., 24, of Hadley, was charged in Hampshire District County Courthouse in Northampton with assault and battery on a police officer and disorderly conduct. He was only found guilty on the disorderly person charges, according to court documents.

Longardner, a junior environmental designs major, was arrested on Oct. 22, 1994, after he allegedly engaged in a struggle with State Trooper Daniel Rose. Assisting officers from the UMass and Amherst Police Departments came, separated the men and conducted the arrest.

Longardner was a passenger in a vehicle stopped after midnight for a headlight violation. He got out of the vehicle and refused to re-enter when Rose demanded that he do so, according to Massachusetts State Police records.

Police reported that Longardner refused to enter the vehicle, threw his cigarette on the ground, and refused to pick it up. Longardner was repeatedly warned that his refusal to comply would result in arrest.

In the trial, the defense stated that Longardner was trying to ask the officer his reason for pulling the car over, and the officer became irrational and "out of control."

According to Longardner's account, one of the passengers was claustrophobic and needed to step out of the car. Longardner joined him and lit a cigarette.

He did not throw the cigarette down — he flicked away its ashes, and Rose demanded that he pick them up, Longardner said.

Rose said he had pulled the vehicle over for a headlight violation, but when retrieving the driver's license he detected a scent of alcohol.

Although the driver tested negative for alcohol intoxication, Rose said he still got nervous when he saw two of the passengers get out of the car while he was seated in his cruiser conducting a computer check.

After a verbal confrontation, Rose attempted to place Longardner under arrest and a struggle ensued.

Although Longardner did not attempt to fight back, Rose struck him repeatedly with a flashlight until it fell apart. At that point, Longardner picked the light up and handed it back to the officer who proceeded to strike him with it again, Longardner said.

Assisting officers responded to a call, and made the arrest.

Longardner was released with a total fine of $130 for the disorderly person charge.

Area price chopping to end in May

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Competition in the local grocery retail market will dwindle next month as Price Chopper grocery stores will be closing their Amherst and Northampton stores on May 21.

"We are closing them because they had become unprofitable," said Barbara L. Page, Price Chopper public relations manager.

The primary customers at the Amherst and Northampton stores are students, which led the stores to become seasonal stores.

Page said they are offering full time associates the opportunity to take jobs in their six remaining Massachusetts stores including a new 82,000-square-foot Pittsfield super store which will open this summer.

"Consumer trends of the 1990s are leading toward one stop shopping at super centers which usually include banks, video stores and even dry cleaners," Page said.

The stores here in the valley are small 28,000 to 30,000 square-foot facilities. The Amherst store employs 75 people, 60 part time and 15 full time.

In the Amherst area Price Choppers were forced to compete with Victory and Super Stop and Shop which are all located within about a mile of each other. The situation is similar in Northampton as well with a Super Stop and Shop down the road from the Price Chopper.

Price Chopper rents the space the stores reside in Amherst and Northampton, so the company will return the land to the owners, Crest Development in Amherst, and Bob Glass in Northampton.

Page said there are no plans to have closing sales to deplete or eliminate inventories.

Stop and Shop spokespeople refused to comment on how the closing of local Price Choppers will affect their business in the valley.

The Golub Corp., a family owned company in Schenectady, N.Y., owns the Price Chopper chain of stores which includes 79 Price Chopper grocery stores and 9 Mini Chopper convenient stores in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania and Vermont.

UM alumnus honored with medal

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

At a Sunday evening dinner party at Hillside, home of Chancellor David K. Scott, the host bestowed a prestigious award upon a famous University of Massachusetts alumna.

Loretta M. Long, also known as "Miss Susan" from the popular children's television show "Sesame Street," was granted a medal as part of the Eleanor Bateman Alumni Scholar in Residence Program. Long received her doctorate in education from UMass in 1973.

"I never thought I would get something this wonderful," Long said.

The Eleanor Bateman Alumni Scholar medal brings distinguished alumni back to campus and puts them in an undergraduate setting, according to John A. Feudo, director of alumni relations. The honoree stays in Van Meter's Bateman Suite, where students have the opportunity to interact and listen to the award-winner's life experiences.

"The purpose is to bring together the best and the brightest the University has to offer," Feudo said. "The award [is given to] alumni who have distinguished themselves in their chosen fields."

In granting the award, Scott said Long is "certainly one of the bright stars in the firmament connected with education.

"When we look at Loretta Long's career ... one can't fail to mention the 25 years of outstanding performance on 'Sesame Street,'" Scott said.

Long, who grew up on a farm in Paw Paw, Mich., has a distinguished career of educational work with elementary schools, junior high schools, high schools and universities.

The awards ceremony was attended by many UMass faculty.

Eleanor Bateman, who graduated in 1923, was very active in alumna activities, Feudo said. The award has been given to Unita Blackwell, the first Black woman elected mayor in Mississippi, who received a masters degree in regional planning in 1985, and Gerry Brooks, a television news anchor who graduated in 1974 with a communications studies degree.

Also bestowed with the award was Rep. Peter Torkildsen, the first UMass-Amherst alumna to be elected to the U.S. Congress, who graduated with a bachelor of arts degree in political science in 1980.

WOMEN making WAVES

Mandela ousted from post

Winnie Mandela was recently fired from her South African cabinet post by her ex-husband for allegedly speaking out against his government and possibly being involved in some questionable business practices.

Nelson Mandela, president of South Africa, made the decision to fire Winnie Mandela after hearing reports of her supposed "shady business dealings," which have yet to be specified.

Winnie Mandela, 60, will retain her elected post in the Parliament for the African National Congress and also as national president of the ANC Women's League.

She has also been accused of being insubordinate to her ex-husband, defiantly critical of the new government, radical, and flamboyant. All of these factors reportedly contributed to her dismissal.

Campus drinking epidemic

Researchers reporting in the Journal of the American Medical Association have found almost 40 percent of female college students are binge drinkers.

The survey, conducted nationally, concluded nearly half of those women are frequent binge-ers, meaning they consume more than four drinks in a row.

The Journal stated binge-ers are 10 times more likely than non-binge-rs to engage in unprotected sex, get in trouble with campus police, damage property, suffer injuries, and become full-fledged alcoholics.

Hillary Clinton breaks the silence

Hillary Rodham Clinton has been touring South Asia and lecturing on Improving the lives of women throughout Third World countries.

The first lady has been speaking on such topics as giving women a stronger voice, which she expressed through a poem written for her by a young Indian woman finishing her last year of college.

The poem, titled "Silence," was written by Anasuya Sengupta and was read by Clinton at the Rajiv Gandhi Foundation in India.

The poem begins "Too many women in too many countries speak the same language — silence." The poem ends with "We seek only to give words to those who cannot speak ... I seek only to forget the sorrows of my grandmother's silence."

Man who shot at Clinton accused of faking illness

By Cassandra Burrell
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A 26-year-old man on trial for trying to kill President Clinton is faking mental illness to escape punishment, a federal prosecutor told a jury Monday.

"The man's faking. He knows this is his only way out," Assistant U.S. Attorney Eric Dubelier said during impassioned closing arguments before jurors began deliberating in the trial of Francisco Martin Duran of Colorado Springs, Colo. "You don't have paranoid schizophrenia one day and it's gone the next day." But defense attorneys said psychosis prompted Duran to stand in front of the White House for hours last Oct. 29, then suddenly open fire with a semiautomatic rifle.

"He clearly shouldn't have shot at the White House. There's no question about that," Public Defender A.J. Kramer said. "Clearly, Mr. Duran had some crazy ideas. That hardly makes him an assassin."

Two psychiatrists and a psychologist have testified that when Duran began shooting, he was firing at what he though was an evil "mist" that was taking control of Clinton's mind and leading him to destroy the world.

"In his mind he was protecting us from some sort of force that he believed in," defense attorney Leigh Kenny said. "You may want to laugh about it and say, 'Oh, my God.' ... That tells you more than what the doctors have told you."

Prosecutor Brenda J. Johnson countered: "There was no mist. The only mist is the one they are trying to pull over this jury." Three behavioral experts called by the prosecution testified that Duran was sane at the time.

Attorneys for both sides spent most of Monday morning making their final arguments before a jury of two men and 10 women. The trial began March 16 with jury selection.

U.S. District Judge Charles Richey then explained the charges to the jury. Jurors were dismissed for the day after meeting for about 20 minutes to elect a foreman.

Duran's attorneys have conceded that Duran fired at the White House and carried two firearms across state lines, but they say he never intended to kill Clinton. On Monday, Kramer asked jurors to acquit Duran of charges attempted assssination, assaulting federal officers and using a firearm during a crime of violence.

Kramer said that on the morning of Oct. 29, Duran watched Clinton return to the White House from the Middle East via a helicopter that landed on the executive mansion's south lawn, Kramer said.

Hampshire College lecture explores turmoil in Burma

By Sanuber Denizmen
Collegian Correspondent

Students are crying out for freedom and peace in other parts of the world — students who are on the front line in Asia, in particular.

Susan Darlington, an anthropology professor at Hampshire College, spoke about former students of hers that are currently fighting in a civil war in Burma.

Darlington's lecture,"Violence and Non-violence in the Struggle for Democracy in Burma," was held in Patterson Hall at Hampshire College. Approximately 25 people attended.

As part of her presentation, she read from emotional letters of Karen students, four of which are on the front line in a war for freedom and democracy on the Thailand-Burma border. Karen is one of the ethnic minorities in Thailand, on the Burma border.

These were letters of Karen students she had previously taught, written to her Hampshire students. They all said that they were fighting for their freedom and security.

"We are fighting for the freedom. Nowadays Karen people are oppressed and tortured in many ways," one of the students wrote.

"Some people had to run to the forest. They built a hub and live as refugees. Some children can't go to school and can't write their own language."

Similar situations were described in the letters. Darlington said she read them to show the experiences of the people she was in contact with, and illustrate the situation in Burma.

"Burma was labeled as one of the worst human right situations in the world by [the United Nations] in 1993," she said.

The Karen have been fighting this war for 46 years, Darlington said.

Burma won independence from British rule in 1948, but the parliamentary system lasted for only 14 years.

In 1962 General Ne Win along with the military came to power. There was a severe decline in economy under military rule.

As a result there was a national uprising, "a peaceful uprising" that was put down violently, she said. An estimated 3,000 to 10,000 people were killed in a three- month period.

In September 1988 the military crew took over the military control instigated marshall law and set up State Law Order Restoration Council (SLORC), and that was the end of the open movement.

SLORC has been fighting with the Karen National Union (KNU) and other minorities by attacking their villages and torturing them.

"Under SLORC 50 percent of the budget goes to military," she said. "SLORC rules through fear and in fear."

Young Karen leaders are now searching for peaceful ways of negotiating with SLORC to gain an autonomy within their own territory.

Until now, none of the proposals made have been agreed to by the SLORC, but Karen people still hope that they will gain their independence some day and are determined to do anything and everything until they get it.

Budget cuts before tax cuts

The hard-line Republicans are clamoring for a quick-fix solution to the nation's economic woes by trying to enact a $500 per child tax cut. After encountering difficulty trying to cut funding for student loans and unwed mothers on welfare, the GOP is rehashing the Reagan-era policy of cutting taxes before cutting spending. It didn't work in 1981, and it won't work in 1995.

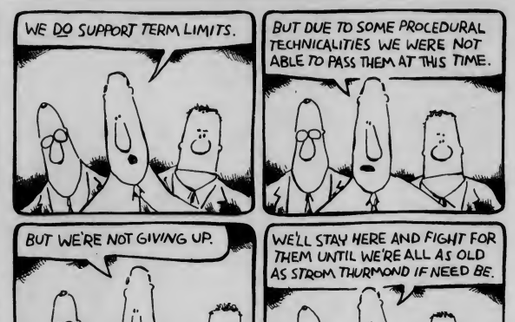
Tax cuts are easy to initiate, since they enjoy such popular support. But voters did not endorse a sweeping turnover of Congress to settle for easy solutions to the nation's budget crisis. In fact, the federal budget would be in balance for fiscal year 1996 if it weren't for the interest doled out on the national debt.

According to an NBC News poll, 53 percent of people favored a reduction in the deficit. Twenty-six percent of people wished to lower taxes and 15 percent wanted an increase in funding to other programs.

The dollar hit record lows against the Japanese yen and the German mark last week in part, because investors aren't willing to place their confidence (or their money) in a nation whose government doesn't appear willing to keep its finances in order.

If Congress could target inefficient programs, instead of programs with weak political support, then meaningful cuts would have already been enacted. But the GOP has yet to turn their rhetoric into any meaningful cuts. Reforming welfare and slashing social programs such as the NEA and PBS won't make serious dents in the budget. They certainly don't justify tax cuts.

The last time Washington cut taxes before they cut spending, we found ourselves mired in debt that still burdens us today. Let's not make the same mistake again.



WE DO SUPPORT TERM LIMITS.

Willful ignorance has returned to U.S.

Peter Orvetti

After two centuries, the battle between the Jeffersonian and Hamiltonian styles of democracy is finished. The winner: Big Al, hands down.

The last election cycle, and the 100 days of turpitude that have followed the installation of Lord Newt and his merry band, are more evidence that the average citizen is no longer worthy of the honors Jefferson bestowed.

To call a voter unworthy on account of ignorance is despicable. This same argument was used to keep Blacks from the polls in the South, and women from the polls everywhere, for most of our nation's lifetime. But willful ignorance is another matter entirely.

Information is accessible from more sources, for more people, than ever before. Who doesn't have a television?

Who doesn't have 35 cents for a newspaper? The dawn of cable television has even allowed each side of the political debate its own pulpit. There is no longer any excuse for not knowing.

Journalist Joe Conason put it better in a 1993 essay on the Religious Right movement. "An electorate that is simultaneously angry and inattentive may be capable of acts that are awesomely self-destructive."

In 1992, 40 percent of Americans were prepared to vote for Ross Perot as soon as he implied he might run — and before he ever uttered so much as a syllable on any policy position. Also that year, 37 percent of New Hampshire Republicans opted for Patrick Buchanan for president. Two weeks ago, this same Buchanan denounced Jewish protesters as "the people we're fighting against."

Willful ignorance — the refusal to watch the first 10 minutes of the evening news each night — has returned America to a period of demagogucry not seen since the 1930s. Only this time, Newt Gingrich, who wants to take away aid to children, school lunches, and "Sesame Street," is in the populist Huey Long role. Rush Limbaugh doubles for Father Coughlin.

Consider the exchange between a husband and wife printed in the March 27 New York Times. The 45-year-old woman, queried by a reporter, admits that she still has never heard of the Contract With America. Her helpful husband, age 44, tells her that it is a trade pact with Mexico. Populus vult decipi, ergo decipatur.

The irony of the ignorant electorate is that it follows conservative demagogues — Gingrich is House Speaker; Phil Gramm and Pat Buchanan are right behind Bob Dole in GOP presidential polls — but desires progressive government. Surveys show that voters want to sustain Social Security, education, and some welfare. They want to cut defense.

A less promising irony is that these voters decry government as the enemy, and then look to right-wingers as a sort of Big Mother. We are running to Big Mother for protection, from magazines and paintings that we are afraid to look at, sitcoms and dramas that we fear reflect our lives a little too closely, and books and political organizations that we are afraid to hear.

Voters want to see the government get smaller and taxes shrink, but they do not want to lose their pork-barrel paychecks. The blue collars of Groton and Loring may hate liberal big-spenders, but they hate budget slashers even more. In the end, we are stuck with a supersaturation of military toys to play with.

Ultimately, we must resign ourselves to this foul permutation of democracy. It is going to get worse, not better. As information grows progressively, entertainment grows exponentially.

Folks are just going to become less and less attentive to the state of the nation, and upstart potentates like Ross, Pat, Phil and Newt will have a field day.

Perhaps Hamilton's KO of Jefferson is best described by the current American hero, lauded because he blindly follows his government since he isn't smart enough to know any better. Indeed, stupid is as stupid does.

Hoop dreams often turn into real nightmares

A.J. Stewart

Now that the NCAA basketball tournament is over, we can analyze the winners and losers. Not Arkansas and UCLA, but the people who make their living off the sweat of young men. In a nation where slavery supposedly ended 130 years ago, basketball players nationwide are being exploited by their schools, shoe companies and television networks.

The NCAA rules have created a system of chaos in basketball and the other revenue generating sports. Instead of receiving a portion of the profits, the athletes face poverty in exchange for their long hours of practice. When Donta Bright or Dana Dingle go to Foot Locker, shouldn't they be able to afford their own replica jersey? Who sees the piles of money made? It isn't the players. It's Coach John Calipari, Athletic Director Bob Marcum, the apparel maker and Foot Locker.

And when you see your beloved UMass hoops team on television, with the players looking like giant billboards for Nike, who do you think sees the money from the rights fees and advertisements? Not Derek Kellogg or Marcus Camby, the people who are actually playing. It is the networks and the schools who divvy up the booty. Consider that CBS recently paid more than a billion dollars for the rights to the tournament alone. But with NCAA rules and federal decisions on gender equity, Lou Roe gets as much as a lacrosse player: a full scholarship.

Now I can almost hear the collective "but, but." The truth is, this scholarship is not all it's cracked up to be. The season stretches from October to March, with daily practices and film sessions, games, tournaments and travel time. Such a demanding, acrutinized schedule leaves little time for a player to be a person, much less an athlete. Is it any wonder that our basketball players get behind in class, and get discouraged? This takes away from their ability to enjoy academic opportunities the rest of us take for granted, such as internships, co-ops and study abroad. Imagine the look on Calipari's face if Camby wanted to spend next spring studying architecture in Rome. His commitment to academics would then be in full bloom.

A common refutation of all this is that they will get paid in the NBA. When you see a Glenn Robinson signing for 60 million dollars, chances are that you don't feel much sympathy toward college basketball players. But the fact that Lou Roe will make big money doesn't do Jeff Meyer any good. The payoffs are good and the odds are bad. Calipari doesn't support the other coaches with his salary. Why should Camby support the water polo, baseball, and cross country teams?

Calipari, Rick Pitino, Tubby Smith and Nolan Richardson are the highest paid public employees in their respective states. If this is not indicative of the college basketball madness, of the gigantic corporate structure that the NCAA has created, I don't know what is. The worst part is the cynicism with which schools exploit their basketball player chattel. The profiteers in College Basketball, Inc. are too busy lining their wallets and sleeping in comfortable beds to see that their workers' hoop dreams have turned into nightmares.

The age of urban innocence

Stanley Boykin

I had a choice to make, and I had to make it soon. I weighed the possibilities, but couldn't come to a definite decision.

Do I want to catch the bus? It's not that cold, I thought to myself at first, but then the wind started to blow and I changed my thinking. I was debating my options when I noticed the thing out of the corner of my eye, getting ready to turn the corner. I could have tried to make that bus, but since I didn't want to look foolish by missing it, I let it speed away. At least it gives me a chance to see the neighborhood again, I thought, trying to find some comfort in the situation.

I turned and started to head down the street. It really seemed like it's been a while since I've walked through here, especially since college took me away. The scene brought back memories of my youth, when I would walk home from Mattapan Square each day after getting off the school bus. Through the square, across the traffic, and down the winding street that led to my block. Just like old times, I had a chance to do it again.

I looked over and noticed a young boy walking on the other side of the street, bundled up in his winter coat, with a school bag draped across his back. He looked visibly cold, but the thin, dark face was happy nonetheless. I smiled, my man was glad that it was Friday, and he couldn't wait to get home and have some fun with his boys. Walking the way he was ... I couldn't help but notice how much he reminded me of myself the time I was his age. He noticed the leafless trees sway and howl in the wind. He noticed the cars coming around the corner, and tried to determine which one he would have when he was grown up. And he glowed ... a rare, precious, unobstructed smile that I rarely see from other kids, let alone older people. He was happy — a carefree, innocent happiness that I remember having when walking the same walk. The age of innocence, I thought. My smile slowly faded.

I began to feel sadness at the fact that one day, that innocent smile may leave that boy's face for good, when he has to stand against the burdens placed on his shoulders by society. Will he stand when he's told that he'll be lucky to reach 21? Will he stand when America labels him a thief, a liar, a murderer? Stand when the nation condemns him as being hopelessly unintelligent and useless, condemned to live his life as a member of the permanent underclass? Will he stand? And if he does, will he smile, like he does now? Will he be able to walk this walk in a few years and hope the best for another young person, as I do at this moment for him?

The young boy caught my gaze and looked my way. After the initial surprise of finding me staring at him, his smile returned, and he crossed the street to greet his brother.

Usually I would find something to fuss at him about, but today was different from most days. I looked at him not only as my brother, but as a young Black male in American society — a rare gemstone to be treasured, valued. I realize the struggle that will face him as he grows from a boy to a man. And I fear that one day, and one day soon, he will walk down the same street — and the smile will be gone. And all the kindness, joviality and gentle gestures of hoping and dreaming that all young children have — will be gone forever, leaving only a cold and empty expression on his face, a lingering testimony to the somber truth and dark wisdom that he will acquire about life here for his people.

A tear rolls down my face. One. The impact of that possibility affected me in ways I wasn't ready to deal with. And before he catches the drop rolling down from my eye, I turn quickly to wipe it away. He had hardly ever seen me cry up to now, and I wasn't about to make a performance for him now. Laughing at my pride, I grabbed his head and started rubbing it with my knuckles in the fun, gentle manner that I'm sure he's most at that moment was to keep him smiling. Smiling, hoping, dreaming as he was a moment ago — so that he rises to the potential I know he has within him. And with the right guidance, he definitely can rise — rise above the stereotypes and stigmatisms reserved for him and others like him. And when it happens, he will smile, smile the way he always known how to.

Letters to the Editor

Republican rally covered poorly

To the editor:

I am writing in response to the article titled "Rally turns into shouting match" by Collegian reporter Christopher Hassett on the front page of the Collegian (Thursday, March 30). I was severely disappointed and disheartened by apparent shoddy, yellow journalism displayed in the poor coverage of the Republican Club rally on the Student Union steps that previous Wednesday.

As I read the article I began to wonder if the Collegian reporter even attended the same rally as I did. As one of the principle organizers, as well as a speaker at the rally I can say with certainty that the rally NEVER "quickly denigrated into an argument between speakers at the podium and protestors in the audience." The members of the Republican Club made a concentrated effort to present an informative presentation to the campus community, well based in fact, statistical data, and personal knowledge of the Republican Contract With America.

In fact, all the Republican Club wanted was a chance to present the truth, not rhetoric or buzzwords, about the Contract. Unfortunately, several members of our campus do not feel that every member of our University deserves the right to speak. We at the UMass Republican Club feel that protest, when in moderation, is a viable form of political free speech. The protestors at the rally came with the idea of silencing a differing viewpoint on this campus. One protestor went so far as to attempt to get behind the speakers platform with the intent of interrupting the speaker (who was at that time myself). According to University policy on rallies on the Student Union steps, no one is allowed behind the speakers platform except speakers. When a member of the Republican Club stopped the protestor from going behind the podium in accordance with this policy, he was sworn at, called a Nazi, and threatened with physical violence. If it were not for the intervention of the bystanders, I find it highly likely that this emotionally disturbed person would have made good on his threat and attacked one of our members. Yet, the Collegian failed to mention any of that incident, instead presenting the protestors as a substantial part of the crowds who were able to drown out the speakers at the podium. In fact, the protestors in general did not try to engage in any form of debate with the speakers, but instead resorted to name calling, referring to Republican Club members as "fascists" and "Nazis" simply because they hold a conservative viewpoint.

The protestors, in fact, represented a minority of those present at the rally. The crowd, that at some points neared 150, constantly clapped and cheered at various points in support of the arguments presented by the speakers. A small handful of less than 15 protestors was not able to silence five times that number of supporters present in the crowd.

But yet, Hassett almost completely missed these facts too. He presented a biased article in my opinion, and at the least is charged with poor journalism. It was apparent from the get-go, evident by the photo that accompanied the article. It pictured Alan Keeler, father of Republican Club treasurer John Keeler, engaged in a heated argument with some of the protestors present at the rally. As an incident that lasted all of three minutes, this incident had little, if any, impact on a rally that lasted almost an hour.

I would ask in the future that you at the Collegian send a real reporter, who can get the story right, and tell it with an unbiased eye, instead of turning your paper into a propaganda piece. Keep the yellow journalism to the tabloids.

Latino culture alive at UMass

Various Hispanic groups gather to celebrate in unison

By William A. Dávila
Collegian Staff

This past Friday, March 31, more than 700 people came together at the Campus Center Auditorium to experience the diversity and culture within the Latin American community. The event, titled "Noche Cultural Latinoamericana," ("Latin- American Cultural Night") was hosted by AHORA, the University's Spanish-speaking student organization.

Master of ceremonies duties were held by Rob Venator and Aida Baez, both students at the University.

Performances included folk music by guitarists Francisco Hernández, Richard Duquette, Deborah Gonzalez and Charlie Berrios. The night also included cultural dances from a variety groups which included the Haitian American Student Association and Casa Dominicana as well as others brought to the University from other areas. Among the countries represented in the dancing and music were the Dominican Republic, Haiti, Colombia, Honduras, Puerto Rico, Mexico, Ecuador and Brazil.

Guests — which included undergraduates, graduates and professionals — were encouraged to sample some Latin American food being offered. The menu included pastries and desserts such as "Besitos de Coco," "Quesadillas" and "Empanaditas de Guayava."

Although the theme of the night included diversity it also emphasized unity. This was literally illustrated in a mural presented which included 21 sections, each representing all the different countries that make up Latin America. The countries were enclosed in their own sections showing their individuality, but they also joined together to form a larger message.

The subtle pattern formed spelled out AHORA. Some participants said that the formation of the word AHORA also defines the need for a united Latino community.

Denny Montañez, the 20-year-old Puerto Rican artist who presented the mural to the audience, was validated with a standing ovation in appreciation for his work. Montañez reminded those present that, although different Latin American countries may have their differences, "Todos somos hispanos!" ("We are all Latinos!") he said.

Also, Magalie Lamour, president of the Haitian American Student Association (HASA), agreed with Montañez and was pleased to see that Haiti was being recognized as part of Latin America.

Following the cultural presentations AHORA presented certificates and plaques to individuals and organizations that have supported AHORA's efforts and/or have taken part in the representation of the Latin-American community here at UMass.

AHORA's President, Juan Antonio Mejia Calabria, presented the awards, and Treasurer Rosa Moret stated that she hoped this will become an annual event.

Also, in the spirit of solidarity, Mejia said that AHORA's goal is to "unify the Latino community. We represent 21 countries of Latin America and on [March 31] we brought them together to commemorate our roots and share with others the beauty of our culture."

Struggle

Daniel Rivera

"If there is no struggle, there is no progress." The immortal words of Frederick Douglass (1817–1895 R.I.P.) have been making a resurgence across the country. Thanks to the move to celebrate the 100th anniversary of his death, his famous saying has become something of a catch phrase by students, professors and activists everywhere. To continue the trend I will add my two cents.

Every day I wake up and attend my classes, go to work, chat with my friends, talk with my partner, and every day, without exception, I find yet another injustice we must Struggle against, or inequality we must combat. So, having the need for Struggle constantly manifesting itself, I felt there should be some Struggle filling that void. What I found out was that there was not enough Struggle going on. Indeed, there seems to be a lot of other things happening; lots of people allegedly taking action, but are they Struggling?

Struggle as defined by the American Heritage Dictionary (yes, I know, but we have not published any non- Eurocentric dictionaries as of yet) is "to exert muscular energy, as against a material force or mass; grapple. To be strenuously engaged with a problem task, or undertaking. To make a strenuous effort, strive. To contend against. Combat." No, Struggle does not mean struggling to get this man or woman's number, or even struggling to make it home after a long night at the 'X'.

Further, Struggle in this context does not even mean struggling to make it to college or to just get a good job; it does not even imply being successful. Struggle in this context is a unified movement to change the inequalities, and to battle the injustices. I felt a definition of the word Struggle was necessary for the students on this campus who have historically been exploited, oppressed and marginalized (the poor and working class, people of color and students with liberal ideologies). If we do not wake up we will find ourselves caught off guard while a confused few undue the Struggles of great people in one full swoop. Someone once said, "If people do not remember their history, they must relive it."

When Frederick Douglass, Pedro Albizu Campos, Harriet Tubman, The Young Lords Party or the Black Panther Party spoke of Struggle, they spoke of it in the context of the dictionary definition's last part: combat. Struggle for life and death, the ability to make enough to feed and house yourself and those you love, and not to struggle for the "middle class" category.

It is important for us to reflect on the injustices that were the catalysts for these peoples' Struggles, and to mirror them to today's experiences by the poor, people of color and women: first, scientific research that supports genetic differences in the races and equates the superiority of one (the white race) over the others, such as The Bell Curve and eugenics. Even more, slavery and bondage: the Crime Bill; money spent on prisons is more than those monies allocated for education; the establishing of Maquilladoras along the Mexican–United States border; and Free Trade Zones in the Caribbean and Central America. Colonialism: Puerto Rico is still a colony and many other Caribbean countries are trapped by the tentacles of neo-colonialism.

The question is that if the conditions that existed and created injustices then still exist under different names today, why then is there no Struggle? Is it Struggle to be content that you are here, even though the fact is that for every poor and working class person and for every person of color on this campus, there are thousands that are not?

You know them: they come visit you on the weekends, they are your friends from high school that you are starting to forget about.

Is it Struggle to make it to this institution and spend all types of time jamming, gigging, drinking, getting 'blunted,' even though we know that out there someone without the means or the resources to get here wishes to be here? You do not know these people: in fact, no one does because we shut our eyes to them as we ride the bus or take the train home, because we know that most of our families are two paychecks away from that.

This is not intended to be a lecture on the social culture of this campus, nor a psycho-babble bullshit about the geopolitical implications of them. No, rather, this is about, Struggle — the need for it, the lack of it, and the dangers of a world without it.

Thus, the next time you come across an injustice or inequality, the next time someone makes a racist, classist, homophobic or sexist statement, or policy, you need to ask yourself to what extent have you Struggled against that type of oppression, and to what extent have you helped perpetuate it. After you figure out how hard you have Struggled with others, to change the inequalities and battle the injustices, only then you may get upset and be hostile. Until that time you must take it and say: "thank you, may I have another!" For if you think that others will Struggle to accommodate you and the needs of your community, just compare a contemporary newspaper with one from forty or fifty years ago — the headlines do not lie.

So then, yes, "without struggle," indeed "there can be no progress." The next time someone asks you to hang a flyer, attend a meeting, listen to a speaker (not anyone "controversial," of course), sign a petition, participate in a take-over, or something "radical" such as registering to vote (or even voting, for that matter), think about the people who have Struggled to allow you to be where you are and whether you are holding up your end of the deal. Others have put strived, Struggled, fought, lost, won, regressed, progressed — just so that you may now have the privilege of continuing to Struggle. Without this reflection, the Civil Rights Movements and the many others arising hitherto, would have been in vain. Understand Struggle, see the urgency for it, and do it harder.

Battling with my African identity in America

Ekra Miezan

When I left the African continent for America, I was expecting to be in a country fortified by Martin Luther King's legacy — where Black children and White children walk hand in hand, where one is judged by the content of one's character, and not by the color of one's skin. I did not expect my racial identity to be prejudicial to me.

Proverbial language is essential in the education of the African child. Proverbs are the experiences of the elders, the wisdom of the community that is imbibed in the education and welfare of the community. My people insisted that I stay away from troubles, for one who causes troubles to others also causes troubles to himself/herself, as the saying goes in Africa. Most importantly, they underlined that, "Troubles do not look for people; instead, people look for troubles. As long as you stay out of troubles, son, everything will be fine," they taught me.

In America, I have learned that the hard way that even when you do not look for troubles, troubles still look for you. One winter's night in 1989, the police of Dover Plain, N.Y., pulled me over "for a routine control," and thoroughly searched my car —it just looked too suspicious for three Black men to be driving at night on a state road, through a town predominantly inhabited by White folks.

Certainly, one of the most humiliating incidents that I had experienced occurred a year later at a bus stop in New York City. While waiting for the bus that night with a dozen White people, two police cars arrived and the officers searched me —because, as a Black man in a White neighborhood, I might be planning to steal White people's cars, I was told!

It was then that I realized that King's prophecies had not been achieved yet, and that America was deeply embedded with racial mistrust and tension. To be Black is to be considered to be criminal. Being Black in America means that no matter how much you stay out of trouble, your skin color already condemns you, and troubles will be looking out for you.

Love is not a word; it is an act, as my people assert. Actions speak louder than words. Showing that one loves somebody is not done with words — let alone with parliamentary laws. Love is expressed through positive and constructive actions and mutual respect. Understanding, communication between racial and ethnic groups, and the concern with each other's problems are some of the golden rules for this type of coexistence.

The media construction of the African, of the African identity has been extremely detrimental to the way Americans perceive Africans. I was ridiculed most of the time in my encounters with Americans. The first discovery of who I was surfaced when my cousin and I were counseling in a camp in Pennsylvania several years ago. Many times, we were thrust in the face with statements such as "are you from Africa where everybody is poor and starving?" or "how did you come here, did you swim?", "do you guys have trucks, cars, airplanes?" or "do you guys sleep on trees?"

One afternoon, during a swimming activity at this camp, a female camper spotted me and imitated the sound of Tarzan made in his movies when calling his "animal-friends." When my cousin instructed her that what she was doing was improper, this camper replied that she was calling me the way Africans did — just like Tarzan did.

My cousin, Kouassi Nobou, has observed that White people he has interacted with have generally asked him stereotypical questions because they do not know the social realities of Africa. They are likely to befriend him, however, when they discover the kind of people Africans are.

Minority women and battering

News Analysis

By Jane Oh
Collegian Correspondent

According to national statistics, a woman is battered every 15 seconds, while a woman dies every 2 1/2 minutes. Whether it is a slap, a punch, or a kick, whether once a month or once a day, domestic violence is nonetheless equally humiliating to a woman's mind, body and spirit.

In addition to this humiliation, concerns such as losing custody of children and revenge from perpetrators, often prevent battered women from stepping forward.

Add to this a language barrier, lack of friends and family nearby, and unfamiliarity with American culture, and you may begin to understand the plight of a minority woman's struggle with domestic violence.

Minority women face many other obstacles as victims of domestic violence. For example, many of these women are not citizens of the U.S. Therefore, a battered's threat of deportation is often enough to prevent a woman from speaking up. Deportation is especially intimidating to women. They fear being forced to leave their children behind in the United States while they move, sometimes continents away. Also, because many women leave their homeland due to social and political oppression, often, their returns home are unwelcome.

Many minority women are also unaware of existing legal measures designed to prevent further abuse, such as restraining orders. Other times, minorities are so distrustful of police and government officials, they avoid them altogether. Also, battered women often speak little or no English, making communication difficult, if not impossible.

Finally, many battered women come from cultures where it is common for men to dominate and "control their women." These women may accept their batterers' abuse as a result of their failures: not being a good mother, not being a good wife. Sadly, battered women begin to blame themselves, convinced that if they start doing this, or stop doing that, the abuse will eventually stop. Others may even dismiss domestic violence as a cultural phenomenon.

What many, especially Americans, fail to realize is that battering is never acceptable behavior; not in any culture, not in any situation, not at any time. Domestic abuse is an international problem which has only one solution — international education.

"Discovery"

As I sit lifted on a plain all on my own
I gaze at this place my people once called home
I can imagine in my mind's eye
The life I would lead, if this fate had passed my people by;
A fate they call discovery, and still call it so today
But those who know the pain from this,
They call it a different way.

By discovery is meant to find someplace never found;
But we were never lost, this is our home ground.
Each nation living from Mother Earth,
Each where they were meant to be;
And with the earth, the four legged and the winged,
They live in harmony.
Only the intruders saw confusion,
Through eyes of greed, deceit, and their Own set of illusions.

They only sought to gain to feed their greedy minds,
Missing the true meaning of this land,
For to it they were blind.
Treading over my Mother Earth,
Crushing through my Mother Nature,
Killing through our people, cursing my creator;
All for the love of land and love of gold,
Gaining all they could and losing their souls.
Defeating my people, but not with a hand of might,
But with blankets of disease, with deceit, with hunger,
Too weak to fight;
Not willing to see our people die
Or to leave our children lost,
They only thought of us, the youth —
Now look at the cost.

So as I sit here on this native plain,
I am as proud as I can be:
My people are strong, we have survived 500 years ...
Of discovery.

Black filmmaker portrays innovative, provocative images

Sankofa breaks with traditional views on African American history and creates heated debate

By Nona Chiang
Collegian Correspondent

This past Thursday night, Sankofa, a film written, edited, and directed by Haile Gerima, a film studies professor at Howard University, was shown at Smith College. Sankofa is a fictional historical account of slavery and of black cultural roots in America.

The film illustrated slave life on a Southern plantation. Flogging and rape were everyday events in the life of slaves. Sankofa exposed how love and family life among slaves was degraded and devalued by Whites. [The viewers were shown the duality of slave life, whether it was between women and men or house slaves and field slaves. In addition, the problems that mulatto slaves faced were brought to light.]

Following the film, Haile Gerima conducted a brief question–and–answer period in which he discussed the difficulties he faced in distributing Sankofa.

When an audience member compared Gerima to the African–American filmmaker Julie Dash (director of Daughters of the Dust), Gerima clarified that while Dash had a company which holds a position within the existing mainstream production business which distributed her film, he did not.

> "If I don't like how you paint me, then I have to paint myself."

Gerima recalled the 1993 Berlin Film Festival, where a group of critics, following a private screening, deemed Sankofa as "not to be shown in the United States," he said.

Sankofa has been seen in some 25 cities across the United States. The film is about to head for California, Gerima said. In the future, Gerima would like to bring the film to Brazil, the West Indies, and South Africa.

However, Gerima has had problems distributing his film. Gerima was given many "highly sophisticated, highly computerized, non–racist explanations" of why they wouldn't distribute his film. For example, one distributor told Gerima that the film was "too Black."

In addition, Sankofa was evicted from three theaters in New York and only later found a receptive theater where it had a successful one year run, Gerima said.

It took nine years for Gerima to raise the one million dollars necessary to produce the film. Ironically, the shooting only took seven weeks. According to Gerima, "the film has grossed two million dollars."

> "most liberated Hollywood people are not ready to see a Native American film beyond Dances with Wolves."

Sankofa has been successful largely due to the African American community, he said. Gerima estimates that "approximately 90 percent of the two million dollars has come from support from within the African American community." Gerima cited small Black radio stations and newspapers as well as word of mouth within the community, "from people such as bus drivers, preachers and secretaries" for the continued demand for Sankofa.

Gerima acknowledged that "the mainstream images of Black and native peoples are negative, thus sees many problems facing Black filmmakers today, such as "the lack of both Black owned movie theaters and support among Black filmmakers."

Gerima made no secret of his dislike of the existing power structure. About the Hollywood film industry, Gerima said, "[it is] simply incapable of dealing with legacies of racism. Additionally, Gerima stated, "most liberated Hollywood people are not ready to see a Native American film beyond Dances with Wolves."

African Americans and Native Americans are both hungry for positive, realistic images of their people."

The audience was encouraged by Gerima not to worry so much about mainstream images, but rather to focus on, "Are we organized to present these images?" Gerima said, "If I don't like how you paint me, then I have to paint myself."

Haile Gerima then went on to discuss the Black filmmaking industry. He

Drawing from jazz roots, Kendrick gives impressive performance

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

RODNEY KENDRICK SEXTET
March 30
Hampden Theatre

There was something unusual in the air as soon as the Rodney Kendrick Sextet took the Hampden Theater stage on Thursday night.

First of all, for some unexplained reason, the sextet played as a quartet for the duration of the two-and-a-half hour program. However, the four musicians (pianist Kendrick, saxman Justin Robinson, bassist Tarus Mateen and drummer Chi Sharpe) seamlessly and soulfully drifted through two hot sets without their fellow bandmates.

Following true jazz tradition, Kendrick's ensemble kicked into their first piece, "Total," about 20 minutes after the concert was scheduled to start.

An upbeat, world-music influenced tune, the opening selection set the tone for the others to come, prominently featuring the high-energy improvisation of the quartet over the course of its 20 minutes.

Although most of the songs were fairly lengthy, the group more than ably managed to keep the music exciting with superlative soloing, particularly that which flowed from Kendrick's keyboard and Robinson's tenor.

With each roll of his fingers across the ebony and ivory, Kendrick seemed humbly dizzied by his own fluidity, appearing to almost lose balance at times.

Comparisons to Thelonious Monk were definitely given credence in the performance, as Kendrick showed the audience that he has retained elements of the paradoxical controlled recklessness as the late Monk.

Robinson was equally as impressive as his piano-playing counterpart, his exhilarating extended bites highlighting many of the evening's songs.

Of particular note was his contribution to the mellow, film-noirish "For Heaven's Sake." Penned by Robinson, the ballad opened with a jaw-dropping, yet tasteful, three-minute sax soliloquy.

UCLA wins NCAA championship

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

SEATTLE — With its starting point guard on the bench and its greatest coach in the stands, UCLA won its first national championship in 20 years and kept Arkansas from joining the select list of repeaters.

The top-ranked Bruins won their record 11th NCAA title Monday night with an 89-78 victory that was even more impressive considering senior Tyus Edney was limited to two-and-a-half minutes because of a sprained right wrist.

Ed O'Bannon stepped up as he was supposed to, but so did freshman Toby Bailey and Cameron Dollar, Edney's replacement. It all meant the first title for the school since 1975, when John Wooden, who sat quietly in the stands of the Kingdome, won the last of 10 in a 12-year span.

As UCLA received the championship trophy, O'Bannon, who was named the most outstanding player in the tournament, turned to the Bruins' fans in the stands, pointed at Edney and shouted: "This is the real MVP right here. He got us here."

O'Bannon scored 30 points and had 17 rebounds in a game that certified his All-America credentials. Bailey, who had struggled to a 1-for-2, two-point outing in the semifinals, finished with 26 points and nine rebounds. And Dollar, the backup point guard who played in the shadow of the lightning quick Edney, came up with eight assists.

"I think he had the best tournament of any player of the 64 teams up until tonight," UCLA coach Jim Harrick said of Edney. "But what a gutsy performance by the rest of the guys. They sucked it up and played hard."

Williamson, who was 9-for-12 in the second half of the semifinal win over North Carolina, finished 3-for-16 from the field against the Bruins, including a 1-for-10 effort in the second half. Instead of the Razorbacks swarming and defending as they had all tournament in the latter stages of the game, it was the Bruins who managed to hold Arkansas without a field goal for a 4:47 stretch that ended with Williamson's first basket of the second half with 2:25 to play.

That made it 77-68 and the Razorbacks were out of the last-minute miracles they had managed in the early rounds. The Bruins built a 65-53 lead with 11:27 left on a rebound basket by Bailey.

Arkansas managed to get within 67-64 on a free throw by Williamson with 5:22 left, but O'Bannon hit a jump hook, Bailey scored on yet another rebound and O'Bannon and Dollar each made two free throws and Bailey scored again and the lead was again 12 with 3:13 left.

Clint McDaniel led Arkansas with 16 points, while Williamson had 12 and Scotty Thurman, the hero of last year's title win over Duke with a last-minute 3-pointer, had five points on 2-for-9 shooting. UCLA extended its lead in the title run, with Kentucky and Indiana second on the list with five each.

The Bruins are 11-1 in championship games and this was their first without Wooden in front of the bench, rolled-up program in hand.

Arkansas was trying to join Duke in 1991 and 1992 as the only repeat champions since UCLA's streak ended. There have been five other repeaters, Oklahoma State in 1945-46, Kentucky in 1948-49, San Francisco in 1955-56, Cincinnati in 1961-62 and UCLA in 1964-65.

Greenwell and Co. trickle into spring training camp

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Mike Greenwell was among the first to show up at City of Palms Park. He was back to work at 9 a.m.

After 7 1/2 months on strike, Greenwell and some of his Red Sox teammates began to trickle into training camp Monday. The pace of arrivals is expected to quicken until Friday, the mandatory reporting date.

"I've got an advantage: I live here," said Greenwell, who showed up the day after the strike ended along with catcher Rich Rowland and relief pitcher Ken Ryan.

"I learned what it would be like not to have a job and be retired from this game," Greenwell said. "It was a nice feeling to be able to spend that time with your family, but I was ready to play baseball 6-7 weeks ago ... I had trouble just driving by the ballpark. Whenever I saw the scores on TV, I'd turn the channel."

There were no workouts scheduled for Monday, so Greenwell threw a ball around with Rowland, then Rowland went into the batting cage.

"I was waiting for this date," he said. "I've been doing everything I can to be as ready as I can. But I was running out of things to do."

When workouts begin in earnest on Friday, Rowland will compete for the starting job. General manager Dan Duquette said the team is looking to shore up catching, pitching and right field through free agency or a trade.

One trade reportedly in the works would send third baseman Scott Cooper to St. Louis for outfielder Mark Whiten and pitcher Rheal Cormier. Another possibility is that Cooper would go to Montreal as part of a deal for reliever John Wetteland and either outfielder Marquis Grissom or right-hander Ken Hill to Boston.

Duquette declined to comment on trade possibilities, except to say he has talked to several other teams.

The GM said the team has not finalized a policy on ticket prices; they had cut prices in half for April. Greenwell said the players will also be trying to make it up to fans for scuttling the World Series last year.

"There's not a whole lot we're going to be able to do besides just go out and try to give them a good show," he said. "We'll be as responsive to them as we can."

As for the erstwhile replacements who might be his new teammates, Greenwell said he understands that they were in a difficult situation, but some others might give them the cold shoulder.

My friend Mark Niznik asked Gabe,

"Correct me if I'm wrong, but has Bob Dylan taken a turn for the worst? I saw him on MTV unplugged last night and he looked as if he'd been unplugged.....by Dr. Kervorkian."

Then Gabe said,

"He should've stayed home in bed.

He's gonna end up in a petting zoo.

Dylan won't make it to the next century."

Too bad..... I always thought I'd meet Dylan someday. I idolized him.

He's a songwriter of great subtlety and depth.

Baseball heads to Storrs for tilt with UConn

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts baseball team will look to continue its winning ways today when they tangle with New England rival Connecticut in Storrs at 3:30 pm.

Coach Mike Stone's squad, winners of their last seven in a row, currently stand at 10-6, 5-1 in the Atlantic 10, and are coming off a three-game weekend sweep of league rival St. Joseph's on the road.

The game against UConn is traditionally a big one, and despite the Huskies 3-12-1 record, Stone knows this won't be just another walk in the *ball*park.

"They are a better team than 3-12," said Stone of UConn. "They are always one of the good teams in New England and we have to be ready."

The Huskies have struggled so far this season, and will have their home opener in today's game. UConn found themselves on the short end of a three game sweep at Boston College this weekend. The Eagles, who thus far are the only opponent that UMass and Connecticut have in common, were defeated handily, 12-6, by the Minutemen at Earl Lorden Field last Wednesday.

Massachusetts, which has been getting strong performances from their pitching staff of late, will look to sophomore righty Jason Bennett (1-0, 2.57 ERA) today to keep the streak alive.

"Jay Bennett had a nice outing earlier in the year against Ohio State, and he's well rested," Stone said.

In that game, Bennett's only appearance of the year, he pitched well, going seven innings and scattering seven hits while allowing a pair of runs. The sophomore walked two and fanned a pair while picking up the win in a 9-7 Minuteman victory down in Fort Myers, Fla.

UMass' pitchers keyed the three Atlantic 10 victories over St. Joe's this weekend, but Stone isn't satisfied.

"They can pitch better," said Stone." (Senior Jay) Murphy and (sophomore Chad) Paromo pitched well, but I'd like to see some of the other guys be more consistent. Although, it is tough when we have 11 guys."

Murphy, who spun a two-hit shutout in a 5-0 UMass win Saturday, was named Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week for his efforts.

The Minuteman offense has been hot, as well. Senior Bill Knight will continue his quest to reach the UMass all-time home run mark. Knight, who has 30 career homers to his credit, needs two more to tie the mark of 32, set by Drew Comeau (1987-90).

Knight, currently batting at a .361 clip, is the team leader with six home runs and 19 RBI this season, and was named the Atlantic 10's Player of the Week. Knight had three home runs in the weekend's series, helping the Minutemen to the sweep of both league awards.

Left fielder Ryan Jette, Massachusetts' leadoff hitter, has taken over the team lead in batting average. The junior speedster is batting .429, and has an on base percentage of .508.

Junior outfielder Nelson Ubaldo (.400, 2 HR, 13 RBIs) and sophomore center fielder Nate Murphy (.340, 11 RBIs, a team-leading seven stolen bases) have also been hitting the ball well for UMass.

The Minutemen return home tomorrow for a double header against Rhode Island beginning at 1 p.m.

Women's track takes first place in home meet

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

For the first time since Sept. 17, 1994, the University of Massachusetts women's track and field team competed in a home meet on Saturday.

The outdoor season opener proved to be a joyous homecoming for coach Julie LaFreniere's team, as they placed first in a five-team meet with 122 points. The University of Vermont placed second with 74, followed by Springfield College (54), the University of Maine Black Bears (18) and the University of Hartford.

"I was pretty sure that we'd win this meet," LaFreniere said. "I just wanted to see where we were at coming off of indoor season, and for the most part, we came back right where we left off."

"I was pretty sure that we'd win this meet," LaFreniere said. "I just wanted to see where we were at coming off of indoor season, and for the most part, we came back right where we left off."

Senior co-captain Janey Meeks competed solidly, as she captured both the triple jump and the high jump. Meeks' 12.09-meter triple jump set a new school record and also qualified her for the ECAC Championships. Meeks' 1.58-meter high jump was enough to top her competition.

Kelly Liljeblad, fresh off of competing in the ECAC Indoor Championships, continued her dominance as the outdoor season commenced. Liljeblad won both the 3000 meter race as well as the 1500 meter competition. She finished 12.9 seconds ahead of the Catamounts' Tanja Odegaard in the 1500.

The 3000-meter race showcased UMass' superior talents, where Liljeblad cruised to a 10:03.3 minute finish. Catherine Galipeau, an Oklahoma transfer who was running her first race for the Minutewomen, placed second. Katie Greenia, a sophomore who is still hampered by an ankle injury that forced her to redshirt cross-country season in the fall and also miss most of indoor season, finished third overall.

The Minutewomen's 4x100 meter relay team of Anya Forrest, Emma Gardiner, Rosie Bryan and Nicole Roberts, scorched Derby Track as they qualified for the ECACs by finishing in just 48.8 seconds.

Forrest also won the 100-meter hurdles, while placing second in the 100 meters, just a fraction of a second behind Gardiner.

Bryan captured the 200-meter race in 25.8 seconds and placed third in the triple jump to accompany her leg on the 4x100 team.

Roberts, the team's fourth leg, has proved to be a versatile runner. She won the 400 meters in 58.1 seconds, 5.6 ahead of her nearest competitor, and also anchored the 4x400 meter relay team, which placed first. Roberts, also an All- American forward for the women's soccer team, performed well in a number of events during indoor season, and will offer valuable contributions to the outdoor team as the season progresses.

The Minutewomen were not as successful in the field, where Vermont won the shot, discus and hammer throws.

Heather Brown's 47.46 meter throw won the javelin title for UMass, while qualifying her for the ECACs.

UMass will return to action on Saturday when the host Boston University and Boston College in a tri-meet.

Women's crew opens with wins

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's crew opened its spring season last weekend with two impressive wins in the San Diego Crew Classic in San Diego, California.

The regatta, which drew more than 3,000 participants from colleges and universities throughout the nation, proved to be a valuable testing ground for UMass crew team in its first year as a varsity sport.

The team placed first with a time of 6:51 in a field of seven visiting schools such as Oregon St., Wichita St., Columbia, Gonzaga and Texas. UMass, Oregon St. and Wichita St. then went on to compete against the top three finishers of the California Cup, a regatta consisting of 12 crews from California colleges and universities such as UC-Davis and UC-Santa Barbara.

UMass finished first with a time of 7:08, outdistancing the closest crew by :14. By winning the California Cup, the UMass crew qualified to compete in the Whittier Cup (held in April of 1996), an invitation-only regatta consisting of some of the best crew programs in the country, including Dartmouth and Radcliffe.

Coach Jim Dietz, a former Olympian who won 45 United States and 37 Canadian National Championship titles in his competitive years, was ecstatic with his crew's performance.

"This is an indicator that we have a really fast crew. We had no idea before the season that we would qualify for the finals in the Whittier Cup along with the fastest crews in the nation," Dietz said.

Dietz praised senior co-captains Amanda Kraus and Wendy Wilbur as bringing strong inspiration and leadership to the crew. However, he said, "There are no stars out there, it takes nine people to get that boat across the line."

This season, members of the crew are excited about bringing boats across regatta finish lines as a recognized varsity sport.

"It makes our lives a lot easier, we don't have to worry about fund raising now, which has enabled us to go to places like California and build our program receiving national recognition," co-captain Amanda Kraus said.

With the spring season underway, the UMass women's crew is setting its sights on becoming a major national force. "We'd like to win New Englands and Nationals and then hopefully go on to compete in the IRAs in June," Kraus said.

Dietz is confident that his team will do well this year.

"I don't think as athletes they knew how fast they could go but they realized this by qualifying for the Whittier Finals and will carry this confidence into the rest of the season," Dietz said.

The UMass women's crew's next regatta will take place on April 15 against the Naval Academy at Princeton, N.J.

Minutewomen to play UVM today at home

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts softball team will play its "home opener" today against Vermont at 3 p.m. at Totman Field. The Minutewomen were supposed to host Yale last Thursday for their real home opener, but Mother Nature caused a postponement.

"We've played 25 games and none of them have been at home so we are really looking forward to [coming home]," Massachusetts associate coach Mona Stevens said.

Head coach Elaine Sortino agreed, "there's no place like home."

Massachusetts will head into today's doubleheader with a 14-11 record, 4-0 (first place) in the Atlantic 10 Conference. Vermont comes in with a record of 5-8, 0-1 in the North Atlantic Conference.

Last season, senior hurler Kelly Daut held the Catamounts hitless in pitching the second no-hitter of her career as the Minutewomen swept a doubleheader 7-0 and 4-3.

This week, Daut was named Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week for the second straight time for her 2-0 mark over the week. In 16 innings of work, she has allowed only one earned run and registered a 0.44 ERA in two complete game victories. She also threw two innings of relief against Temple in the second game of Sunday's doubleheader.

The Catamounts are a young team with just three seniors on the roster. In fact, Vermont's top three hitters are all sophomores. Kristen Nestor leads the team in batting with a .429 average in 11 games of action, hurler Kristen Schoen (1-2 pitching record) is second on the team with a .357 record in seven games, and Jen Winslow is right behind Schoen with a .353 average in 13 games started in the outfield.

"Their program is always competitive, well-coached and they're extremely spirited," Sortino said. "They're scrappy. We are a big game on their schedule so we'll have to be ready."

Junior Kristen Briggs is fourth on the team in batting average and has a team-high 14 hits along with a team-high 12 runs scored. Briggs is also a threat to steal bases, leading the team with six thefts in six attempts. Geri Witalec is behind Briggs with a .323 batting average and leads the team in RBIs with eight.

On the mound for the Catamounts will likely be Carolyn Carr, one of the three seniors. Carr has a 3-5 record and .375 ERA on the year, Schoen (3.78 ERA) and Wendy Houston (1-1 record, 6.55 ERA) could also see time on the hill for Vermont.

Daut (9-5, 1.23 ERA) will get the start for the Minutewomen in the first game, with Dani Ortega (5-6, 2.58 ERA) hitting the mound for the second tilt. Junior Michele Shaw will be behind the plate, were she has been solid with a .950 fielding percentage.

"I think our pitcher-catcher communication has been much better. Our battery is starting to become a unit," Stevens said.

The Minutewomen have been hitting extremely well lately, with sophomores Chris Martens (.417 BA, 18 RBI, 3 HR) and Sam Cardenas (.380, 20 RBI, 2 HR) leading the way.

"We are one of the top teams in the region," Sortino said. "Teams are always ready to play UMass, so we have to be ready to play."

Budget proposal nixes decrease for higher ed

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The House of Representatives Ways and Means Commitee for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts released their version of Gov. William F. Weld's proposed budget on Monday, and contrary to Weld's cutbacks, they voted to meet the amount allotted to higher education last year, known as "flat funding."

The House Ways and Means Committee has finished revising Weld's budget allotment, and they voted to restore $30 million to the state's 29 campuses of public higher education.

Last year's appropriation for the five campuses in the UMass system was $337,135,073, according to Sharon L. Kennaugh, associate director of state government relations. The Amherst campus receives approximately half of the amount allotted to the system since it is the flagship school and its biggest campus.

The Worcester campus, which is the medical school, is slated to receive a $4.6 million upgrade to the $24,021,795 million they received last year, bringing their proposed budget to $28,621,795, Kennaugh said.

Last year's budget for the Amherst campus was $163,973,086, Kennaugh said. Before the budget is finalized and signed by the governor, it has to go through the State Senate Ways and Means Committee.

Robert A. Rothstein, vice president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, said the budget originally proposed by Weld is approximately $19 million short. The shortfall breaks down as $8.5 million Weld wanted to slash, added to the $10.4 million increase requested by the UMass system.

In a statement released from his Whitmore Office, Chancellor David K. Scott applauded the House Ways and Means Committee for restoring the funds that Weld intended to cut.

Scott also voiced his sentiment to persevere in attaining the requested funding not covered by the House Ways and Means vote.

"... we still feel that our original budget request for the University system is prudent, practical, and realistic in light of the demands placed on the University and our service obligations to the people of the state," Scott said as part of his statement.

"We will continue to explain to the public and our elected officials that our budget request is necessary."

Weld released his proposed budget in late-January, when it was then sent to the House Ways and Means Committee, which expected to finish with their revision budget in early April, Kennaugh said.

When the Senate Ways and Means Committee finishes their revision, they and the House will send each of their versions to a Conference Committee, consisting of the chairs and vice chairs of both ways and means committees and a ranking Republican from the House and Senate, which will "iron out the differences between the two different versions," Kennaugh said.

The Conference Committee will then issue a report, adopting or rejecting both branches' versions, while no longer amending the budget, Kennaugh said.

The budget is then passed on to Weld, who has ten days to take action, not including Sundays or holidays. The goal is to finish the budget by the next fiscal year, which begins July 1.

House seeks GOP support for tax cuts

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — On the eve of a showdown, House leaders worked Tuesday to coax rebellious Republicans into line behind tax-cut legislation, the last key item in the "Contract With America." President Clinton called the measure too costly and said, "I think we need to focus on the deficit."

House Speaker Newt Gingrich countered that Republicans stand for "a lower deficit, less taxes and a smaller government."

Republican critics of the measure fell into two groups: one favoring curtailment of a proposed $500-per-child tax credit so fewer wealthy families would qualify; the other opposing a provision to have federal workers pay more into their retirement fund.

Several Republican sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, put the number of shaky GOP votes - those opposed or uncommitted — at 20 or so. The GOP can suffer 12 defections and still prevail if, as expected, Democrats unanimously oppose it. Even so, several leadership aides predicted that the measure would pass.

91 exhausting days after they convened under Republican majorities in the House and Senate, lawmakers at least had this to look forward to: A special performance Wednesday of the Ringling Bros. circus on the Capitol plaza.

Taxes aside, the House unanimously approved a separate item in the "Contract With America." It provides for increased prison terms for anyone convicted on federal charges of child pornography or prostitution.

In the Senate, Republicans and Democrats wrangled inconclusively over a bill to cut previously approved spending by roughly $15 billion. Majority Leader Bob Dole, (R-Kan.), accused Democrats of trying to delay passage by insisting on votes to restore money for politically popular programs such as student loans.

But with the House Republicans' remarkable 100-day agenda nearly done, the principal focus was on taxes.

Gingrich (R-Ga.) signed off Monday on a deal with deficit-conscious Republicans under which the tax cuts would be contingent on enactment of legislation later this year designed to eliminate the deficit by 2002.

Asked early Tuesday how the search for additional votes was going, Gingrich replied tersely, "It's going." He has vowed to hold the House in session beyond Friday's scheduled break to assure passage of the tax-cut measure.

He and other GOP leaders met with several Republicans who want to make the bill less burdensome on federal workers.

GLBT studies take next step

Student Government calls upon University to show support

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

With the passage of a motion by the Undergraduate Student Senate, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst comes one step closer to having a gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender studies program.

Passed with overwhelming support on March 29, the motion by the Student Government Association calls upon the University administration to provide support for GLBT studies by enacting the following measures:

- Commit to secure, annual funding for the weekly LGB Studies Brown Bag Lecture Series.
- Create a "half-time" staff position at the Program for GLB Concerns to help initiate a GLBT studies certificate program to be in place at the start of Fall 1995.
- Give release time to faculty interested in developing new courses related to GLBT studies so that by Fall 1996, more courses will be available to students pursuing the GLBT studies certificate program.
- Establish a "visiting faculty" position in GLBT studies beginning in Fall 1996.

The Chancellor's Task Force on Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, and Transgender Matters made similar recommendations in a report issued May 1993. The report calls the measures "short term proposals" toward the establishment of a GLBT studies program.

Motion based on earlier discussion

David Anderson, SGA Secretary of Administrative Affairs, said he based the Senate motion on one passed by the Graduate Student Senate earlier this year. The Senate motion was sponsored by Senators Kevin Clark and Lisa Chiu.

The same set of recommendations is expected to appear in a motion by the Faculty Senate sometime this month, said Anderson, who expects it to pass easily.

University groups pressure administration

Anderson said the SGA plans to meet with University Provost Patricia Crosson on March 10 to discuss the recommendations. Members of GSS, the Chancellor's Task Force, and the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance will also attend the meeting.

A follow-up meeting with Chancellor David K. Scott is expected, Anderson said.

In its original form, said Anderson, the SGA motion read "be it resolved," but Trustee-Elect Daniel Rivera strengthened the wording to read "be it enacted." According to Anderson, even though the SGA does not have primary responsibility for academic affairs, when a measure uses the word "enact," the SGA is saying "do it."

When asked why the University should create a GLBT studies program, Anderson responded, "Why should we have a music major — or a basketball program? You can't justify a need for a lot of things, but the need exists nonetheless."

Support for program exists already

Anderson pointed out that there are several faculty members who are already interested in developing GLBT studies courses. There are many students who are interested in the certificate program, he said.

The GLBT studies certificate program would carry a requirement of five undergraduate courses that deal primarily with GLBT issues, Anderson said. Students will have around 20 courses to choose from.

Anderson said that while GLBT studies would begin as a certificate program, eventually it could achieve the status of a minor. Later on it could be upgraded to a major awarding the Bachelor of Arts degree.

Waste Management set to meet with UM Senate

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

Staff members from University Waste Management will be appearing before the Faculty Senate tomorrow in an effort to increase recycling amongst University of Massachusetts professors.

Marc Fournier, university wastemanager, and Amy Baranowski, intermediate processing facility supervisor, will speak about the benefits of recycling, while taking time to answer and ask questions of the faculty.

"This is a good opportunity to speak to our customers about what they need, what's working and what's not working," Fournier said. "Then we can use that information to modify and fine-tune the program."

A benefit of recycling is that it will ultimately save the University money, Fournier said. Paper, as an example, is a valuable natural resource.

The faculty senate meeting will also be an opportunity to keep the university's professors informed as to what University Waste Management does, Baranowski said.

"Many professors don't like [recycling]," Baranowski said. "It's not part of their job and their not appointed to do it."

Baranowski also said that some may not believe in recycling.

To improve and increase recycling amongst professors, Fournier said he would be speaking about the opportunity for each faculty member to have a deskside recycling container, making recycling easier and more convenient.

UM marketing students present advertising idea

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

A student marketing company presented their plans for advertising during Haigis Hoopla in a meeting with faculty, clientele and General Motors officials yesterday.

Minuteman Marketing is running a promotional in conjunction with Haigis Hoopla to advertise for local car dealership, Lorenz GMC.

"The purpose of the presentation is to present to our client and everyone here our progress, research and promotion plans of the event," said Margo Bennett, senior marketing major and coordinator for the marketing team.

The team presented various events to familiarize people with the Jimmy and sports utility automobiles. The main event is a basketball shootout where the grand prize contestant drives home in a new GMC Jimmy, Bennet said.

Other events include a putting contest, a fishing game, an obstacle course and scavenger hunt.

"The games are designed to link the active lifestyle with the cars and increase awareness of the cars," said senior marketing major Brian Stoller.

In order to obtain advertisement goals and reach the most students, the team conducted research in the form of focus groups, surveys and interviews. The teams research found that students were generally unaware of both the Lorenz dealership and

Int'l speaker teaches with soap operas

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

When reasoning and logic no longer work, one man teaches through soap operas.

William N. Ryerson, executive vice president for Population Communication International, will be speaking at Smith College tonight on the subject of global population growth. The lecture, entitled "Sex, Lives and Videotape," will take place at 8 p.m. in the Browsing Room the Neilson Library at Smith College.

"Teaching through a soap opera reaches people at a cognitive and an emotional level," Ryerson said. "It has a better chance of changing behavior."

According to Ryerson, these programs educate about family planning by supplying role models and by dealing with the underlying issues that motivate people to use family planning.

These issues can be good marriage, bliss and happiness. The programs do not discuss the medical side of family planning as much as it attempts to motivate to plan ones life and plan ones family. The benefits of doing so

UMass nurses participate in rally

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

Nurses from around Western Massachusetts and The University of Massachusetts marched on Washington last month to fight for patient rights.

The March 31 "March on Washington" rally had thousands of nurses from around the country. Included two bus loads from the Northhampton and Springfield area, said Brenda Bowie Monahan, a graduate student and teaching assistant at UMass.

"There were enough nurses to fill Pennsylvania avenue from the Capitol to the White House," Monahan said.

The rally included about an hour of speeches and a two hour march in the nation's capitol, according to Monahan.

The cause for the fight

Monahan, who went to the march, said the nurses were there to fight for three demands — first, for the Congress to initiate legislation to require safe nurse to patient ratios in hospitals. Second, for insurance agencies to consider not reimbursing hospitals that do no keep these safe ratios. Finally, to give nurses job protection so they don't lose jobs if they refuse to accept an unsafe patient assignment where there are too many patients to one nurse.

"We are protecting against the unsafe care of patients in hospitals where nurses are being let go and unlicensed assistive personnel were hired," said Nancy Fisk, a nurse who also attended the march.

According to the Massachusetts Nurses Association, hospitals are cutting the number of registered nurses and replacing them with cheaper minimally skilled workers.

Monahan said this is happening because there was no health care reform passed by legislation, so insurance companies are trying to privatize the health care industry by buying up hospitals.

According to the New England Journal of Medicine, hospitals with a higher ratio of nurses to patients, have six fewer deaths per 1,000 patients than hospitals with fewer registered nurses on staff.

Fisk said there have been a lot of mistakes happening lately, like the recent incident where the wrong leg was amputated from a patient. Mistakes like that would not happen if registered nurses were staffed instead of assistants.

"[The insurance companies] think it's cheaper," Monahan said. "The bottom line for insurance industry is profit — for nurses it's patient care."

The outcome of the march

Monahan said the results of the rally have gotten mixed reviews.

"Congress could not have noticed us," Monahan said. "But the media has gotten in wrong why we were there — the Boston Globe said we were protesting job cuts, the [Daily] Hampshire Gazette said it was to debate budget cuts and the New York Times didn't even cover it."

Monahan said one of the three objectives for the march was centered around job security, but that was also for the safety of the patients.

The National Labor Relations Board said nurses are now considered supervisors instead of regular employees. Monahan said with the new description, that means they are now working for the benefit of the facility, not the patients.

"Before, when we were in a standard employee category we were advocates for patients," Monahan said. "Now, if you can afford to lose your job, then you can speak up for the patients. It's a scary situation to think that something unsafe might happen to you in the hospital."

Fisk said the event was historical because the nurses came together to fight for a cause in such large numbers.

"The march is just a beginning, we're not going to let up," Fisk said. "We will continue to press that all patients in the future will have the right kind of care with a professional nurse."

The "March on Washington" was sponsored by the American Nurses Association, the Massachusetts Nurses Association and Revolution magazine.

Bisexual activist to speak at UMass

Ochs to conduct workshop on creation of bisexual community

By Julia Kazmarek
Collegian Correspondent

A long debated topic, bisexuality has been thought of in many different ways by a variety of people: as a stage, an experiment, or a fashion statement. Seldom is it seen as a legitimate sexual orientation.

On April 5, Robyn Ochs will confront these myths and messages about bisexuality in a workshop called "Creating a Bisexual Identity" at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. The workshop is sponsored by the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns and will begin at 7 p.m. in Program office in Crampton House, Southwest Residential Area.

Robyn Ochs has spent the last decade educating people about bisexuality. Co-founder of the Boston Bisexual Woman's Network and the East Coast Bisexual Network, Ochs has addressed audiences at Harvard University, University of Chicago and University of Oklahoma. According to Ochs, she has also taught three of the five American college classes ever that deal specifically with bisexual identity. Her essays have been published in four different anthologies, and she has even appeared on several talk shows, including "Donohue."

Returning to UMass for the second time this year, Ochs will facilitate "Creating A Bisexual Identity," an interactive workshop about the creation of a bisexual community.

"I think she will create an opportunity for students who identify as bisexual to dialogue with one another about life issues and work toward creating a community," said Marty Martinson of the Program for GLB Concerns.

Associate professor to perform Chicana literature, subvert roles

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The director of the Multi-cultural Center at California State University, Long Beach, will perform Thursday night in "Sin Frontera: Crossfire and Crossroads — Feminist Empowerment Strategies in Chicana Literature."

Dr. James Sauceda will give his "performance and re- vision of the Male Gaze" in the Graduate Lounge at 7:30 P.M. as the third presentation in a series of the Graduate Women's Network Spring Colloquium.

A press release explains, "The idea behind a Chicano male performing Chicana literature is to intentionally subvert the expectations of gender/roles and thus create a new Con-Text for feminist discourse. For years Latino men have disempowered and stifled Latina Voices. This performance seeks to honor Latina's and to face their critique of what Laura Mulvey calls 'the male gaze.'"

Sauceda is a third generation Mexican American born and educated in California. He received a bachelor's and master's degrees from CSULB and a doctorate in Communication Arts and Sciences from the University of Southern California.

Currently Sauceda is an Associate Professor at CSULB, teaching Speech Communications.

The writer has performed his poetry — some of which has been translated into Spanish and published in Mexico — in the greater Los Angeles area.

Sauceda founded and directs a multi-cultural theater troupe called "The Rainbow Voices."

He is currently working on Communicating Across The Cultural Divide: Understanding and Experiencing A Multi- cultural America.

The rich get richer...

Richard Gilluly

Trying to understand what really has happened in America the past 15 years is hard work. That, in large part, is because the GOP right wing, begining with Ronald Reagan, has been so skillful at obscuring what's real and what's false.

So what passes for political discourse in America increasingly is the distracting, contrived junk you see on TV and in read in newspapers — endless irrelevant blather about "family values," Bill Clinton's sex life, the alleged immorality of welfare mothers and, of course, a claimed epidemic of crime which is more fantasy than reality.

Meanwhile, what really has happened is that scores of millions of Americans have been impoverished or near– impoverished as vast wealth has been transferred from ordinary people to the very rich through the lower taxes the latter pay, the higher prices they charge and the lower wages they give workers.

This is no left–wing flight of fancy. Reporters Donald L. Bartlett and James B. Steele of the Philadelphia Inquirer, for instance, have documented the depredations of the rich in scrupulously objective detail (their stories later became two books which are available in the UMass library). Other journalists have captured various pieces of the same scandalous story.

These reporters give the lie to the right's claim that the rich use their increased wealth to create jobs. Often, in fact, the opposite is true. To give just one example, The Wall Street Journal has documented how leveraged buyouts, which generated vast gains for rich financial manipulators, caused huge layoffs of workers.

But right wing intellectuals repeat all the myths — about the immorality of the poor and the sanctity of unlimited wealth for the rich, for instance — over and over again in pseudo–learned articles. These too often are taken as wisdom — or at least as worth quoting — by mainstream journalists. The myths, but not the money, trickle down.

Norman Podhoretz in a recent Commentary article, for instance, lavishes praise on the redoubtable Newt Gingrich, whom he perceives as an exemplar of good sense, scholarship and wisdom. He accompanies his paean with the following:

"Surely if the election of 1994 proved anything, it was that more Americans everywhere ... now understand that [Democratic War on Poverty] programs have had a great deal to do with the spread of illegitimacy and violent crime."

Well, the truth is that illegitimacy is a product of too little, instead of too much, of the War on Poverty. The evidence is abundant that it is caused by two factors:

1. The despair that accompanies poverty, despair which leads poor girls to seek emotional satisfaction in their lives through motherhood.

2. Limited access for the poor to reproductive health services and sex education.

And, as Justice Department figures make clear, violent crime is not on the increase. Indeed, overall crime has decreased over the past 20 years.

As for Gingrich being a giant of our times, look at the record. It shows a man filled with vituperative, moralistic contempt for large groups of his fellow Americans.

He has accused the country's editorial writers of being socialists because many oppose his proposed cut in the capital gains tax, and he claims that homosexual teachers "recruit" children into homosexuality — both charges patent, vindictive nonsense. Earlier, a Newt spin–off group advised GOP candidates in the '94 election to use inflammatory language against opponents in ways not far removed from Nixonian "dirty tricks" or Orwellian "Newspeak."

Some example of lofty principles, Newt Gingrich!

The rightwing intellectuals, through such books as The Bell Curve, also have disinterred a smelly old piece of pseudo–scientific garbage, social Darwinism, which says essentially: the poor be damned; they are inferior anyway.

The real agenda of the GOP right is keeping the rich rich and making them richer. For instance, real welfare reform — which would include job training, health care and day care for poor children — would require higher taxes, and these likely would fall mainly on the wealthy, since the poor and middle already pay far more than their share. The wealthy don't like that.

But if Americans want to discuss real issues again, maybe they could start with something easier, such as the Newt's proposed capital gains tax. There isn't the slightest question but that it would benefit primarily the rich. The House may vote on it this week.

COLLEGIAN ART BY JEFF WILSON

Appreciating mainstream music

Geri Sahn

"Poseurs" and "followers" are names given to people by those who think that they have originated a fad.

People like to be different. They like to be able to take credit for starting a new fad or starting new lingo. And once everyone else jumps on the bandwagon, credit is fought for and anger is felt for the followers. This cycle of discovery also pertains to music.

I recently purchased an album by Ani DiFranco that a good friend of mine introduced me to. In the store she mumbled how she would be upset if she heard Ani on the radio. She later added that she could not help but be possessive about her music.

It is preposterous that people get so angry when their favorite music group, or musician, gets air play on the radio. The music automatically gets stereotyped as being top 40, and looked down upon because "teeny boppers" are now listening to it.

There have been so many times when I would be sitting in a bar, or driving in the car with people, and a person will say, "Oh God. I listened to this music five years ago. I can't believe so and so sold out to the radio."

What is so bad about the radio? Many people can't afford, or don't wish to spend the money on CDs and cassettes.

Why have so many radio stations, with the exception of college stations, gotten such a bad reputation? Being on the radio gives musicians exposure, which in turn gives them more money, which in turn allows them to record more music.

And so what if their music is on the radio? If the music is great, why can't it be shared by everyone? If the person is a good musician, or the group is talented, they are bound to be discovered. Taking pride in being one of the original fans is well deserved, but belittling those who discovered the music later is ridiculous and down right obnoxious.

Those who believe the musician is selling out are really selling out themselves by getting angry and not being a loyal, supportive fan.

I can understand that in some incidents the musicians quality of music goes down because they are under pressure to pump out a certain amount of albums a year under a contract, but to get down on them because they are receiving awards and more fans is wrong.

I, and I am sure many others, go through different phases of the type of music they are currently listening to. I am convinced that the only fans that appreciate new fans are Deadheads.

When I was growing up my cousins and sister, who are part of the generation before me, were very much into the Grateful Dead. I refused to give the band a chance. Yet, in high school I began listening to their music and started to go to the concerts. No one person ever said, "Ah, you're a little late," or called me a fake groupie.

Hopefully, someday there will be a radio station that will give every musician who sends them a tape air play. This will give everyone a chance to discover new bands.

People who have discovered new music should want to introduce it to others. Their attitude should be "Listen to this!" And if the person's song, or the group's song, is on the radio, pump the song loud and be psyched that you know the words already.

A fan's list of demands

David Nash

The headline of most, if not all newspapers on Monday, April 3 was related to the end of the baseball strike.

The players walked off the fields eight months ago, leaving the fans with an unfinished season and no World Series.

Well, they are back.

They have not, however, reached an agreement with the owners. Judge Sonia Soto, U.S. District Court judge ruled in the players' favor and they happily agreed to return. The only sticking point then was the owners. Would they vote to lock the players out? They did not. Baseball is back. Or is it?

While the players have voted to return, there is no agreement that would keep them from walking again this year. So if they are not satisfied that the owners are negotiating in good faith, or if they just feel like it, there could be another walkout. Fans hold off buying those World Series tickets. In an age where players think nothing of breaking contracts before they are up, they expect the fan to take their word. Fat chance.

Players will start arriving at their respective camps on Wednesday, April 5 with the season starting on the 26th. Now the season has not started and the fans are being short changed already.

It will not be a full schedule. The "goal" is to play a 144 game schedule. So before anyone even puts on a uniform the fans are short 18 games. Welcome back.

On the Madison Square Garden network Monday night, Steve Howe, relief pitcher for the New York Yankees, was asked, "What do you think the fans will want?" His response was, "I don't know. You'll have to ask them."

All right. Since you asked, here are some things the fans might like to see:

1. An agreement for the player and owners not to strike or lock out the season. A real agreement, unlike player contracts which are not worth the paper they are printed on.

2. For the players to listen to Ernie Banks, who once said, "It's a beautiful day, let's play two." Play the full 162 games. There are such things as double–headers. Playing a few would enable Major League Baseball to complete its 162 game schedule.

3. A freeze on all ticket and concession prices for at least four years. The fan has been bearing the brunt of skyrocketing player salaries since free agency was instituted. It is time for someone else to do it.

4. Make player contracts mean something. A player will negotiate a four or five year deal, then have a career season and want to negotiate. Worse, they will find out they are not the highest paid player at their position. A contract is a paper on which two parties give their word. Make your word worth something.

5. Stop charging fans for your autograph. This is probably the most important thing. Players are paid millions of dollars to play baseball, then they want to charge some kid $30 for a signature. I don't know who came up with this concept, but it certainly wasn't the fans. After enduring strikes, poor play, poor sportsmanship on the field, no World Series and more, the players should be paying the fans.

6. How about some hustle on the field for the mega bucks. The percentage of players who go all out on the field is very low. Players seemingly want to save themselves. For what? The next contract. The players have signed on to play, so play.

7. Get rid of Donald Fehr. Fehr is probably one of the most hated individuals in baseball. Which is quite an accomplishment for someone who is not a player, coach, manager, or even a batboy. He is the union head that has added new meaning to the word strike. If he is not careful he will be more unpopular than Saddam Hussein.

Those are just a few of the things that some fans would like to see. There is probably no chance of any of these things being instituted, but fans should be used to getting the shaft.

Baseball and hockey went on strike, and basketball threatened to do the same. The last person ever considered in these things is the fan. The player can save the fan is important rhetoric. We are not buying. Just play ball and don't say anything.

Letters to the Editor

New York institutes death penalty

To the editor:

New York has jumped on the bandwagon. It's now guaranteed that the death penalty will be installed in my home state beginning Sept. 1 — an unfortunate step for a longtime Democratic liberal state.

With Governor George Pataki in office things have changed, making the death penalty the pillar of his campaign and making New York the 38th state capital punishment. This is his idea of sending out the message that New York is cracking down on crime.

But I don't agree with his solution. It's been 18 years since the U.S. Supreme Court has allowed capital punishment to resume in this country — a pretty short time for all the executions that have ever taken place. And despite two decades of court decisions attempting to define when capital punishment is constitutional, huge differences persist in how it operates from state to state and even from county to county.

So how can the same jurisdiction decide who will die and who won't die, and how is that decided? Statistics show that there are about 50 or 60 executions for every 22,000 homicides every year. This issue has been studied for 20 years, but I still can't see the logic in a judge sitting down and deciding where the "lightning is going to strike next" when compared to the huge number or murders that take place in New York.

We, as humans, are deciding the fate of another fellow human. How is it decided whether a person who brutally murdered someone else is deserving of the electric chair, over someone else who also committed murder in the same state? Where do we draw the line on this issue? So far that line has been extremely blurry and can't possibly serve as an answer to homicide crime anywhere.

While there are some predictable patterns in how the death penalty is used, such a low proportion of the nation's murderers are executed that there are no clear cut predictors of who will be put to death. Even though it is already going to be done, it seems highly disorganized and dangerous.

Until a clear–cut and equal stand can be taken on this issue with capital punishment, it seems ignorant, as well as unjust, to me to execute other human beings in New York and anywhere else, despite their crime, so randomly.

University cops enforce police state

To the editor:

I was recently pondering the role of the police at the University. What are the cops doing all night? All I really have to go by is occasional readings of the police report in the Collegian and a few experiences with police at traffic stops. More importantly, in my analysis is that I know that this is a community of students.

What is it that the police should have to stop students from doing or who are the invaders that we need to be protected from? Some students sell drugs to one another. Some students streak across the campus pond area. Some students behave violently in the dormitories. Things happen, but bad people are not coming to this University and disrupting things. It is not influences from the outside that are polluting our environment. The police at UMass are here to keep students in check, to keep up from getting to our of control.

So what? Aren't I glad that the police are here to protect me from people who choose to be violent? Yes I am, but I am concerned that we are confronted with a force that is inherently, structurally, against us in our role as students. Why should the police care, for example, if students buy and sell drugs?

It is a practice, that while not wholly approved of, is needed to fulfill a perceived need on behalf of the students who use it. The groups that act on our community, people in the government and administration, put police here to keep Massachusetts and the United States at a large comfortable with the 'enforced' decisions that young people are making. The police are here to insure that the University, a place where most people are trying to make self conscious decision about the society they what to live in, from rising up and acting on the system as a whole.

Students make it easy for the police to justify their role by not unifying and making public statements about this being unacceptable. They allow the police terror of the drug war and concerns about their future and being 'blacklisted' to be successful.

This is a call for students to act on the knowledge that the university is actually a police state, a colony under the jurisdiction of a foreign confederation, a boot camp preparing them for the "working years," maybe 23 to 65 when their very sustenance will be based on competition in the labor market — men, women, people of all colors and religions, forced to see themselves as commodities and come to the grim realization that they are valued less, much less, than they are actually producing.

Held back at every opportunity to move in the direction of community and modernity is not easy for those who remain high spirited, so the rich of Ameriea have sent the cops to UMass to break our spirit and get us into the habit of bowing to authority before we go out into the unhappy world of enforced choices and limited freedom.

Wasps' Nest offers a star–studded line–up

WASPS' NEST
The 60ts
London Records

The 1980's were notorious for sappy love songs by pop bands such as Duran Duran. Stephin Merrit, leader of the 60ts, remembers these days all too well and he is not afraid to show it. On Wasps' Nest, there are 15 orginal tracks all written by Merritt and sung by some of the brightest stars in the underground pop world.

Just like most early '80s top 40 tracks, this album is filled with great melodies and cheesy song lyrics ("You Can't Break a Broken Heart"). And as an added bonus all the songs are played on synthesizers and not real instruments: true 80's style. But for some reason this album really works well and is an absolute delight to listen to.

Trax On Trax Off

At first glance the focus of the album is on the all–star cast which includes notaries such as Lou Barlow of Sebadoh, Mac McCaughan of Superchunk and Dean Wareham of Luna, but their importance is minimal. In almost all cases the guest vocalists are singing songs they would never perform with their respective bands and this adds to the spice of the album.

But more importantly, the songs themselves are what makes the album stand out. Merrit's songwriting is on a level that most songwriters can only dream about.

One track, "Here In My Heart" sung by Anna Domino must be a lost ABBA tune. At first listen it sounds exactly like the infamous Swedes but Merrit is hardly not afraid to admit he is a great fan of theirs.

If you like pop melodies of any kind, this album is a must. Wasps' Nest captures the best of 80's pop songs by some of todays brightest stars. What a nice combination. A– (Michael Burke)

HORSEBREAKER STAR
Grant McLennan
Beggar's Banquet

Grant McLennan's old band, The Go–betweens, held the sort of influence in Australia that The Smiths held in Britain and R.E.M. hold in the U.S. So great was their dominance that Lemonheads collaborator Tom Morgan was compelled to write the song, "I Don't Want To Be Grant McLennan;" he was the only antipodean musician who didn't!

McLennan and dourer guitarist Robert Forster possessed the detatched cool of a thousand Sonic Youths, combined with the knack for bruised pop gems. McLennan invented the quirky–pop romanticism that Crowded House strummed into the charts, and with Horsebreaker Star Mac seeks to claim his dues and grab a slice of the capitalist cake for himself.

True to form, Mac casts himself again as the Cohen–esque Bed and Breakfast poet, with an ear for the sort of tune that you envision being whistled by bus–drivers everywhere. Horsebreaker Star is similar to 1986's 16 Lover's Lane, in that it is full of picture perfect pop–paens to unrequited lovers, which Morrissey would give his colf for! The album's opener "Simone and Perry," sets the tone for the rest of the nineteen songs of this album; dealing as it does with the no–man's land between love, lust and loneliness.

Grant McLennan, formally of The Go–Betweens, has released his debut album Horsebreaker Star.

Mac is still mining his classic influences on this album– Dylan, Cohen, The Beatles; but mixes in a heavy dose of country. This is most evident on "Coming Up For Air," which makes one immediately think of Gram Parsons' heart splintering laments, with Syd Straw playing Emmylou Herris to Grant's Gram.

Mac chose to record this album in Athens, Georgia and one can clearly hear the influence of Athens' more permanent residents throughout. Producer John Keane was recommended to Grant by Pete Buck himself and lends a compassionate ear to all of Grant's songs. Unfortunately, McLennan seems condemned to cult status in America. Let's face it he is a balding, concise songwriter, playing country–tinged pop from the other side of the world. Maybe Mac will

Pearl St. crowd treated with Widespread jams

By Jorma Kansanen

WIDESPREAD PANIC
Pearl Street
April 3

Last Monday night, the streets and avenues surrounding Pearl Street were abuzz with anticipation. As the Widespread Panic followers crowded around, after making their respective journey's from anywhere from Cape Cod to Portland, Me., the wishes for a "long night" were heard in the air.

After a up and down first set, though, the wish was granted.

Hitting the stage with their long time live piece, and made famous by The Blues Bros., "She Caught The Katy," the show began on a upbeat note. Seemingly playing it safe for the first few of numbers, the band ran through a couple of new songs like "Can't Get High" from their latest release Ain't Life Grand.

Warmup for the night ahead segmed to be on their minds, and by "Ain't No Use," the band was primed up after this energetic and adventurous version.

But by the midpoint of the set, the energy level went slightly down as they explored more of the contemplative style (otherwise known as the "sit back and light one up" syndrome). What surfaced was a very small feeling that they were forcing their improvisational side in "Gradles" and "Machines;" but not too much, as lead guitarist Michael Houser kept his solos clean and crisp.

A familiar tone hit the air afterwards, as they went to their first release Space Wrangler for "Stop–Go." Bassist David Schools' lead at the beginning reminded of "Fire On The Mountain," and it permeated through the Pearl Street air like a torch in the night. Finishing up with an extremely hyped version of "Papa's Home," the up and down nature of the set left without a trace of afterthought.

Like the beginning of the first set, Widespread opened up with a rocker in their title cut from Ain't Life Grand. After that you could write off any notions of touching upon their many musical styles, as the band turned it up a notch with a set that literally flew by. Going from songs like "Rock" and "Blackout Blues" — rock was definitely the buzz word for the rest of the show.

The highlight of the night, though, was not the lead men in front like Houser and singer/guitarist John Bell, but was the rhythm section. Schools, percussionist Domingo Ortiz and drummer Todd Nance were laying down the backbeat law that you could feel in the center of your chest. From funk to rock, they captured the night.

Later in the set was their showcase, as they ran through covers like "Low Rider" and originals like "Fish Water." Ortiz took the timbales and congas by storm, as the reserve he showed most of the night, melted into the massive sound that he and Nance collaborated to create. There was plenty of solo room, and both did not disappoint.

With a three song encore that included new tunes yet to be released, the crowd's undivided attention was their's. One of the songs, "Let's Get Down To Business," could say that was the theme for the night. After a reserved start to the show, that is what they exactly did. B+

What is a Textbook Buyback?

The Textbook Annex now buys books from you on a daily basis. The best time however, to sell your books is at the end of the semester. At that time, the Annex will pay 50% of the new price for a book if we have an order for that book for the following semester and we need to purchase copies. If we do not, the wholesaler may make you an offer.

Wholesalers are in the business of selling used books to colleges and universities across the country. Therefore, in determining how much they will pay a student for a book they must consider the demand for that book as well as the shipping and handling costs involved in processing and reselling the book. This is why prices vary and indeed change frequently. Generally only current editians have value.

If you have any questions please ask the people daing the buyback or the Annex staff. They will be more than happy to answer your questions and give you any tips that may be applicable to your situation.

Shallow Grave should stay buried

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

SHALLOW GRAVE
Directed by Danny Boyle with Kerry Fox, Christopher Eccleston
Playing at Pleasant St. Theater

More like gravely shallow. To say this is less a bad pun than a bit of an understatement — pushy, poorly plotted and not very well directed, Grave keeps asserting itself as a dastardly clever contraption, a pitch-black Hitchcockian comedy in the (God help us) Pulp Fiction tradition. But it isn't a very good contraption, and it implodes not soon after it wears out its welcome. Nor is it very Hitchcockian, or for that matter, very funny. We're "0" for three here, folks.

For three young Glasgow snobs, tormenting potential roommates who don't measure up is a Sunday afternoon spectator sport. David (Ewan McGregor), Juliet (Kerry Fox) and Alex (Christopher Eccleston) finally settle upon a shadowy figured named Hugo. When the man turns up very naked and very dead one morning next to a suitcase full of cash, the trio face their version of a moral dilemma: do they keep the money and get rid of the body?

What do you think? After the grisly, arduous task of dismembering Hugo — the film's relative and ironic high point — tensions ripple through the enormous, improbably color-coded flat (each is supposed to represent a character, I guess, but all it signifies to me is that the director should spend more time on the characters and less on what signifies them). Greed seeps in, and even when Hugo's thug pals come knocking for the missing money, the roommates are still turning on each other until we're primed for an appropriately bloody showdown.

With shades of Fiction, Blood Simple, The Grifters and seemingly every B-movie heist picture from studio vaults, Grave pulps along, confident in trashy allure as (ho-hum) post modern hipness. But it's a dreary exercise in this new, Tarantino-ruled world of comic/violent chic, closer to Academy Award winner (!) Roger Avary's disastrous Killing Zoe than Fiction (for which he won that co-writing Oscar). Like Zoe, Grave is content enough to slide by on its shady moral leanings and slick, ostensibly satiric tone. But it doesn't wash, especially considering that cutting up a guy's dead body for his money isn't that far-fetched (sounds like the lead story on your local news or a new Fox pilot), and neither is this jokey riff on it.

Even detractors of Tarantino must admit his storytelling and comic/horror skills after slumming through Grave, which nevertheless has been winning sporadic raves as a great movie (lay off the Avocados, guys), winning it the elusive and much-misused term of "Hitchcockian." Now you don't have to be a Hitchcock scholar to realize that even at his comically darkest (like in Frenzy, a film Grave habitually echoes), the master of suspense knew that, regardless of a plot's outlandishness, it needed to be grounded in character.

Not so in Grave, which attempts to assert that we should care what happens to these three vague personas when it's hard even to buy that they'd be friends (which may indeed be the joke, but it doesn't work; it's a filmic realization of that old Zen notion of the sound of one hand clapping). And so when one character goes bonkers, holing himself up in the attic, it seems less like an intriguing development and more like the sign of a lazy screenwriter more content to use third-rate noirish "ambiguity" to fill in the holes instead of doing the work himself. It's the conceit at the center of Grave, a willingness to sell out its already cursory characters with motivations springing from a desire for more twists in the plot (and more obtuse camera angles) above anything else.

Succeeding not even as a cheerfully disreputable potboiler, Shallow Grave sums up its own colors in one scene. The designated loony character, still hibernating in the attic, drills various holes in the floor to spy on his roommates. With sharply defined, characteristically predictable shafts of light beaming through, this already tired visual cliche makes you wonder if the holes represent those in the plot or the director's head. No points for guessing my opinion. D+

Ex–'SCTV' star 'Under Fire'

Dave Thomas discusses 'SCTV,' Brett Butler & comedy

By Scott Williams
Associated Press

NEW YORK — To hear Dave Thomas tell it, he just doesn't belong in a hit sitcom like ABC's "Grace Under Fire."

"Being in a hit is really a new experience for me. I've never been in a hit — ever!" said Thomas, who plays sweet, shy pharmacist Russell Norton, a perfect second banana for series star Brett Butler.

Thomas is best known for his work in the "SCTV" troupe, where he and Rick Moranis became the beer-swilling, belching McKenzie Brothers, later immortalized in the cult film, Strange Brew.

"We did it originally as a satire to insult the producers of 'SCTV,' who had asked us to come up with something specifically Canadian," said Thomas, a native of St. Catherines, Ontario. "Wouldn't you know it would become one of the biggest hits of the show?"

He and Moranis co-wrote, co-directed and co-starred in Strange Brew, but Thomas said he avoided the Hollywood career moves that launched fellow "SCTV" players Moranis, John Candy, Catherine O'Hara and Andrea Martin.

He wanted full control of his work, as they'd had in "SCTV."

"You get to a $40 million movie and they're never going to let you control it," he said. "Some guy with tongueless loafers behind an executive desk is going to be calling the shots on what's funny and what isn't," he snorted. "Like they ever had a waking funny thought in their lives!"

So it is that Thomas finds himself working on one of America's most popular situation comedies, where he's no longer the master of his own comedic destiny.

Or is he?

"They had me carping about my ex-wife all last year because they thought that was funny," said Thomas. "I said, 'I'm sick of this. I'm not going to do it any more.'"

He said he tries to portray Russell as a decent man.

"Yeah, there are jerks out there who will abandon you. There are other jerks who are wrong for you," he said. "But then there are other guys who look like schmoes but are like rocks. They're solid and they're there."

"Don't panic. They're there," he said. "Russell Norton is one of those guys who is dependable, who likes kids, who keeps his promises and who plays by the rules."

"So when they give me a thing to do where he doesn't act like that, I won't do it," he said. "Honestly. I'm a subversive sitcom player. I really don't belong in the form."

Thomas extends his "subversion" to his star and boss, Brett Butler.

"I can make her laugh. And I love that," he said. "I'll change the lines on her. Not enough that it throws off the scene, but enough that it'll stop her in her tracks."

He also makes up lines that he thinks are funnier than the script. He recalled a Christmas show where his line was, "Grace, do you know how to program the VCR?"

"I just thought, 'I don't have to say that. I don't WANT to say that!' So I came in and I said, 'Grace, one of the wires on your cheese slicer broke.' She just went nuts. She laughed for about five minutes."

Thomas always conforms to the script during its first read-through on Tuesday. Then, during rehearsals,

On video: Hollywood's worst director

By Douglas J. Rowe
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Ed Wood pile at video stores is growing. A week before Touchstone Home Video's April 18 release of Tim Burton's comic paean Ed Wood, MPI Home Video is offering The Ed Wood Story: The Plan 9 Companion, which documents and celebrates the life of the cross-dressing director, considered to be the worst filmmaker in Hollywood history.

The second part of the title refers to Wood's best-known work, 1959's Plan 9 From Outer Space, which many movie mavens consider the worst of all time.

However, as this documentary rightly notes, it became hip in the late 1970s to find bad movies laughable — and now there's a school of thought that recognizes Plan 9 as "the Citizen Kane of so-called 'so-bad-they're-good movies.'"

Playful knocks on Wood have made him a cult fave as the ultimate awful autcur.

This documentary chronicles how that underground cult came above ground, and serves as a fitting genuflection to Wood, mainly because it has the cheesy feel of Wood's own ouevre, which includes the semi-autobiographical transvestite epic Glen or Glenda.

And in trying to be comprehensive, The Plan 9 Companion strays far afield in devoting parts to the foremost members of Wood's motley retinue of friends and performers in the '50s — Bela Lugosi, by then a sad, drug addicted has-been; TV horror hostess Vampira; 400-pound Swedish wrestler-turned-actor Tor Johnson; and fake psychic Criswell.

Wood himself can be seen as a rather pathetic figure, reduced to directing porn, drinking heavily and even unable to make the rent on a $30 a-month apartment in a shimmy part of Hollywood. He died in 1978 at age 53.

Still, Wood probably would be stunned to see how his work lives on, in books, midnight showings of his movies across the country, fan clubs, science fiction conventions — even successful reissues of his work on video.

Other films by Wood available on tape include Bride of the Monster with Lugosi playing a mad scientist, Revenge of the Dead with Criswell cloyingly narrating, Jail Bait with Steve Reeves playing a cop instead of Hercules, and Glen or Glenda with Wood in the lead under the pseudonym Daniel Davis and Lugosi as a Great Spirit commanding (inexplicably): "Pull the string!"

To capitalize on Martin Landau winning a best-supporting actor Academy Award for his portrayal of Lugosi in Ed Wood, MPI also is making available Bela Lugosi: The Forgotten King, a film from the '80s that looks at the career of Hollywood's most famous Dracula.

While sympathetic to the Hungarian icon, this movie forthrightly recalls Lugosi's drug addiction and how he made a welter of B-minus films. The main reason, of course, was his crowning performance (and accent) left him hopelessly typecast.

It's a role, he finally realized, he couldn't escape.

"Dracula never ends," he said late in his life. "I don't know whether I should call it a fortune or a curse, but it never ends."

Along with Landau, Burton's 1994 black and white tribute stars Johnny Depp, Sarah Jessica Parker and Patricia Arquette.

PRICK
Prick
Nothing/Interscope

Industrial music definately shows no signs of stagnation — Prick's self-titled debut is a testament to that fact. Mixing in elements of Nine Inch Nails, Jesus and Mary Chain, and the aural sculptures of Prick mastermind Kevin McMahon, Prick is a rollercoaster ride of challenging complexities, emotional highs and lows, and a dichotomy of contrasting ideas that, in many ways, make you feel funny.

Co-producer Trent Reznor (NIN) says, "Everything Prick writes sounds...wrong," and indeed it does. But within its disregard of traditional song structures and whimsical mood changes, things somehow gel together. Such is accomplished through McMahon's embrace and manipulation of modern technology.

Demonstrative of Prick's twisted concoctions is "I Got it Bad," which starts off with a manic groove fueled by McMahon's nasal rants. Just as you get riled up, the song goes into a new wave, disco shuffle. It goes on to change even more with sections of sparse acoustic guitar, and pretty soon you're lost within the song and living the journey of McMahon's vision.

Other tracks are just as unconventional. "Communique" goes from angry to cheesy within seconds, while "Animal," their first and most commercial single, takes a basic pop song and fuses it with abrasive walls of sound to express both its brutal and gentle nature.

As one can probably sense, cursory listens won't cut it with Prick. Prick is an experience; sitting through it in its entirety can be unnerving, yet its fragmented, avant-garde pretensions somehow cohere. With industrial music being once considered a novelty, it's refreshing to see something broadening the genre. A– (Waykcn Shaw)

TRANCE PLANET
Various Artists
Triloka Records

Looking for something a little more alternative to the "alternative" scene? Then look no further. Trance Planet has it all. Released by little known Triloka Records, this compilation of 14 songs from Spain, Morocco, Zaire, Mozambique, Mongolia, Tahiti, Argentina, Corsica and American, is a little multi-culteral gem. Greatly influenced by the musical experimentation and collaboration of Peter Gabriel, Trance Planet provides the opportunity to bathe in the pool of talented international musicianship which has become cut off from the polluted mainstream.

A quick skim of the tracks offers a notable collection of international celebrities. Ali Akbar Khan is one of the finest living Indian musicians of our time, a master of the 25 string Sarod while Nurat Fatch Ali Khan is the best known singer of qawalli — a vocal expression of Sufism — and in collaboration with a Canadian producer offers a new, contemporary slant to his art in "The Game." Mercedes Sosa has been championed as Latin America's greatest living singer and her signature son "Gracias a la Vida," written by the late Chilean poet, Violetta Parra, appears as a fitting intorduction to the power of her musical appeal.

Other artists include the Orchestra Marrabanta from mozambique, the Tahitian Choir and Ceasaria Evora who led the lineup of Miss Perfumado, one of the biggest selling records of 1993.

Brought together these artists provide a breathtaking insight into the diversity of the international music scene. Vocals harmonize and uplift, exciting rare emotions and unearthing forgotten passions. In the background a myraid of instruments combine and transcend the expectations of even the most erstwhile Dead fan. However, Trance in the club scene sense of the word, this release definitely is not. The hard-sell of the publishers is less than subtle in this case, but the rubric does point out that the tracks encourage an expansive state of mind, one open to new ideas and receptive to an appreciation of cultural diversity. perhaps we should all give it a try. A– (–Richard Tyler)

he'll change a line. "I usually wait until Thursday, because if I change it Tuesday, they're tired of it by Thursday."

"The directors get so mad at me!" he said, beaming.

"If I have anything that I think is really funny, I'll save it until Friday," when the show is taped. "So then the audience is roaring, Brett is roaring and what are they going to do, cut it? Say It stinks? It's funny! Everyone thinks it's funny."

In May, he and 'SCTV' alumnus Joe Flaherty start shooting a comedy special for cable's Showtime network about the final adventure of Sherlock Holmes and Dr. Watson. "We're in the middle of writing it now," he said.

Not everyone knows that Thomas was an original co-executive producer, with Vin DeBona, of "America's Funniest People."

"I helped put the show together, but I wanted it to be more than it was, and ultimately, I ended up again being a subversive element," he said.

Thomas continues his subversive ways next month as executive producer of an ABC pilot he describes as a "combination of sitcom, quiz show and reality program." It's titled "Family Challenge," where families compete in cooperative games — with a twist.

"We send some family member who thinks he's funny into a convenience store with instructions to make the clerk laugh," Thomas chortled. "Of course, we've also paid the other guy 200 bucks not to laugh."

One day, I decided to sell my car and be like Walt Whitman. I would go into the woods and live life simply and in harmony with nature. But first, I had to get rid of my car. So I put a classified in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. The next day, I looked for my classified, and I saw a classified for a really cool motorcycle. Lt. promoted to deputy chief of UM police

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts division of public safety has appointed a new Deputy Chief of Police after a two and a half year vacancy.

Lt. Barbara O'Connor was appointed on March 19 as a 12-year veteran of the UMass police force. She follows Chief Jack Luippold Jr. who previously held the position.

"Lieutenant O'Connor is an officer who has moved through the ranks of public safety and has continually carried out her responsibilities in an extremely meritorious and exemplary manner," Luippold said.

As Deputy Chief, O'Connor said she continues to do many of the responsibilities she had as a lieutenant, including managing the field training program where new officers get three months of field supervision.

O'Connor said she is most proud of the training program the department has. The officers attend a mandatory police academy before coming to work for UMass, and the department keeps up with regular training programs.

"The training exceeds what a municipal officer gets," O'Connor said. "Making sure your officer keeps up their skills is important."

The training program, however, is usually the first to get cut from departments when funding is tight, according to O'Connor.

"We have taken a strong stance on keeping [the training program]," she said. "It will cost more in the long run if you cut training."

Among other responsibilities, O'Connor said she oversees the mounted, foot and bicycle patrols.

Currently the bike patrol is not in operation due to renovations of the police department, she said.

"We have a problem with storing the bikes," O'Connor said. "We're hoping to get that going again."

Along those lines, O'Connor said she would like to see the police keep moving towards the community policing aspect. This includes the mounted, foot and bicycle patrol, where contact with the officers is more personal.

"Programs were officers are more involved with the community," O'Connor said. "There is also the possibility of a civilian police academy or ride alongs."

O'Connor said the police department as well as the University has changed since she came to UMass in 1983.

"We didn't have a mounted unit or a bike unit," O'Connor said. "The drinking age was 18 or 20 when I came here. The drinking problem was more prevalent."

She said that the drinking problems have gone down since then, but it is still the number one issue the department faces.

"Our problems have been consistent as they relate to alcohol," O'Connor said. "With assault and battery cases, alcohol is usually involved in that."

O'Connor is a graduate of Westfield State College and Springfield Technical Institute Community College. Among other awards during her career in law enforcement, she received a medal of honor.

the automobiles, and found the Sonata too expensive and believe Japanese automobiles are of a higher quality then American cars.

The team also conducted research on the media habits of the campus community, their primary target audience, too get the most for their advertising dollar.

The team will conduct radio advertisements on WHMP, cable television advertisements on ESPN and CNN, print advertising through fliers, campus mailings and advertisements in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian two weeks prior to the event.

The team's research found WHMP and the Collegian to have the highest popularity among the campus community. The team choose ESPN and CNN over more popular local stations in order to re-affirm the sports-oriented nature of the event and to reach a slightly older audience.

The advertising slogan chosen by the team is "Seize life by the wheel," said Stoller.

"It's a carpe diem sort of attitude," he said. "Just to go out and do whatever you want."

The research conducted after the event will be most important since it will display the success of the teams advertising efforts.

"I'm looking forward to seeing all the results and the post event [research] results," said Steve Lorenz of the Lorenz car dealership.

The post event research will consist mainly of a two page survey and a post-event perceptual map, Bennett said.

"I've been to other market presentations in my division of General Motors and I have not seen one nearly as well done," said Paul Wanat, GMC district manager, "I'm not just impressed, I'm overwhelmed."

The Haigis Hoopla will take place at the Haigis mall April 21 through 23.

Soap opera have played on television and on the radio in Tanzania, Brazil, India, Kenya, Philippines and Mexico. Similar programs are also being planned for China, Ryerson said.

"These are powerful teaching tools through vicarious observation," Ryerson said.

As a vice president, Ryerson's duties consist of a combination of problematic involvement including supervision of all research worldwide and administration within the organization along with raising funds.

Cigarette ads to be moved from view at New York arena

By Michael J. Sniffen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Sued by the Justice Department, Madison Square Garden agreed Tuesday to move cigarette advertising signs out of the camera's eye during televised basketball and hockey games and other sports and entertainment events.

The lawsuit was the first brought by the department to prevent circumventing the 1971 federal law banning broadcast advertising of cigarettes.

Without admitting wrongdoing, the Garden agreed to the decree.

The government accused the Garden, which owns the New York Knickerbockers of the National Basketball Association and the New York Rangers of the National Hockey League, of violating the Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act by displaying a large Marlboro cigarette sign directly in front of the scorers' table during televised Knicks games.

Assistant Attorney General Frank W. Hunger, head of the department's civil division, announced that the lawsuit and a consent decree resolving it was filed in U.S. District Court in New York.

Without admitting wrongdoing, the Garden agreed to the decree. The decree would prohibit placing cigarette signs on or adjacent to the playing area or walkways to the locker rooms during televised events. It also bars placing cigarette signs at any spot "regularly in the camera's focus" during the telecast of sports or entertainment events from the Garden.

"I am happy to report that Madison Square Garden removed the sign during the course of our discussions," said U.S. Attorney Mary Jo White of New York.

"It was Congress' wish that broadcast audiences, especially young people, be protected from a barrage of advertising inducing them to smoke," Hunger said

UCLA celebrates record 11th title

By Beth Harris
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Ed O'Bannon was expected to deliver a national championship to UCLA and he did.

Now, the Bruins are looking to add a few more NCAA titles with new stars like Toby Bailey and Cameron Dollar. O'Bannon led the Bruins to their first national title in 20 years on Monday night with 30 points and 17 rebounds in an 89-78 victory over Arkansas.

But it was Bailey, the freshman who had 26 points, and Dollar, the sophomore who replaced injured team leader Tyus Edney, who have UCLA thinking about next year's Final Four.

"I guess you could call it a new UCLA," Dollar said.

Added Charles O'Bannon, Ed's brother: "Now the North Carolinas, the Dukes, the Kentuckys still have a long way to reach all the national titles that UCLA has accomplished. We're just pushing it further and further away."

The Bruins have a record 11 championships. Kentucky and Indiana are second with five each.

The Bruins (31-2) finished with the most victories in school history and never fell below seventh in the AP poll before spending the final three weeks at No. 1. The only losses came against Oregon and California.

To the surprise of many, Dollar proved an able replacement at point guard when Edney's sprained right wrist forced him out of the game after 2 1/2 minutes.

Dollar started the first seven games of the season opposite Edney, then subbed for him against Southern Cal when Edney missed the second game of his career because of the flu. Dollar had 9 points, five assists and one turnover in 32 minutes in the 73-69 victory.

He played four minutes more against Arkansas, with 6 points, eight assists and three turnovers.

"The SC game, where I stepped in and he wasn't even there, prepared me," he said.

The backcourt of Dollar and Bailey broke down the Razorbacks' defense, and in the process, gained valuable experience for next season. Bailey once again showed he has a knack for coming from way out and slamming down his teammates' missed shots.

"I wasn't nervous at all, I was just fired up," Bailey said.

"I had heard all the critics say the freshmen didn't show up (against Oklahoma State) and they're going to have to show up for this game. That's what I tried to do."

Freshman J.R. Henderson was the only Bruin who struggled in the title game, getting just 2 points and two rebounds. He had started 13 straight games at the beginning of the season before settling into the role of UCLA's sixth man.

"This was the right season to win it all because people were really dogging us," he said. "People questioned our defense a lot, but I don't think they can question it anymore. There's no more we can prove. We did it all."

After two years of bumping chests during pre-game introductions, the O'Bannon brothers played their final game together.

Ed and Charles fought through the raucous mob on court to share a tearful embrace.

"We looked at each other, and he just lost it," Charles said. "It was a feeling, not like a death, but like a positive going on. I'm left behind and he's going on to bigger things."

Seeing Ed cry triggered a few tears in Dollar's eyes.

"It's one of those special days when you do something as a team and you love each other as brothers," he said. "We really showed that we are the UCLA basketball team, and that's the greatest feeling in the world."

Ed O'Bannon, Edney and George Zidek are graduating, but the Bruins return an impressive lineup.

But the two most memorable experiences for Laing at UMass are the aforementioned career best A-10 Championship performance, and on the other side of the spectrum, the Arizona Daily Star Classic last season.

After a fall on her most dependable event, the vault, Laing questioned herself, not so much physically but mentally. She was able to fight through her fears on the vault and eventually learned something about herself that has benefited her team as well.

"That fall made me think that I needed to also be a mentally strong gymnast," Laing said. "It was not a positive situation when it happened, but it made me think that I am really in control of my training and attitude.

"It has definitely turned me around, because whenever I am down I will say to myself 'I can do this.'" quarter, in which opponents have outscored it, 23-16. That bodes well for UMass, which has tightened the screws after the break. UMass has outscored opponents 18-14 in the first half and 17-8 in the second, including a 9-4 edge in the final period.

UMass traumatized Hofstra goalie Mark Spruyt, who entered Friday's game with gaudy numbers, and the Minutemen must do the same today for a win. Duke's Joe Kirmser sports a .656 save percentage and has been named player of the game three times, a team-high.

Faceoffs may be a key in today's contest. Jay Robbins has only won 34.8-percent of his draws, but when he wins he is a lightning quick catalyst. Duke, however, has four players with winning percentages just below or over 60-percent.

Today's game and all others can be heard live on WMUA, 91.1 FM, the flagship station for UMass lax. Pre- game begins at 1:30 p.m.

Duke will test men's lax in top ten meeting

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

A six-goal win over a top ten team makes a pretty good hat hanger. Unless, of course, the victor's next opponent is equally ranked.

The No. 9 University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team beat, nay, flogged then-No. 8 Hofstra, 11-5 Friday. But there is no rest for the Minutemen, who meet new No. 8 Duke this afternoon at 2 p.m. on the natural grass of Duke Lacrosse Stadium in Durham, North Carolina.

All things considered, UMass (2-1) really could not play any better than it did Friday night. That said, the goal for UMass should simply be duplicating that superior effort.

"We're not worried about the rest of the season, we're worried about Duke," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "It's a big trip for us. We're going to play good defense and play hard."

If Cannella's players follow his orders, the game could look a lot like Friday's rout, which showcased UMass' sparkling defense, arguably the nation's best.

Co-captain Jared Lanning probably deserves the official title of "leader" of the backliners, but the unit's re-emerging star is Dennis Kelly. In just three games, the junior defenseman appears to have regained the form that made him an All-New England selection in 1993, his last full season with UMass before quitting the team last season for personal reasons.

Kelly was almost always near the Hofstra ball carrier, and he repeatedly forced turnovers that ignited UMass' equally pristine offense.

"If we play with emotion and heart, we'll do fine," Cannella said.

With its athletic strength concentrated in a small group of under-publicized, non-revenue sports, UMass often produces truly great yet unsung athletes. One is senior goalie Tom LoPresti, whose ten saves on the Flying Dutchmen did not amount to a remarkable total, but nearly every save was remarkable. LoPresti's numbers have dipped the past two years, but his accumulating experience (today is his 43rd career game) has put him in position to make this his finest campaign. His 1995 record is 2-1 with a .560 save percentage (50 shots, 28 saves) and a 7.4 goals against average.

COLLEGIAN FILE

Goaltender Tom LoPresti has played exceptionally well in net for the Massachusetts lacrosse team, starting the season out with a 2-1 record heading into today's game at Duke.

As a team, UMass comes up short on experience this season compared to Duke. Today's game is the 10th of the year for Duke (7-2), which cannot afford to look ahead to next Saturday's clash with No. 2 Virginia, the Blue Devils' last chance to pick up a win in the tough, four-team ACC.

Duke fell to then-No. 10 Maryland (up to No. 3), 8-6 on March 4, and to then-No. 15 North Carolina (now No. 7), 13-9, on March 29 in an alternative version of the heated Tobacco Road war.

The Blue Devils have beaten three ranked teams this year — Brown, Georgetown, and most recently Harvard, 13-11, on April 1.

Men's track ties Maine in spring season opener

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's track team got off to a good start as they tied for first place in the opening outdoor meet of the season. The Minutemen and the Black Bears of Maine each came in with a total of 76 points, followed by Vermont (45 points). Hartford was held scoreless.

UMass and Maine had met in the indoor season, with the Minutemen prevailing. But with key competitors back for Maine, the meet was close to the end.

> "You have to say that our strength is that we don't have too many weaknesses"
> – Coach Ken O'Brien

"We had expected for these teams to be rather even," Massachusetts coach Ken O'Brien said. "Both teams competed very well. Opening meet performances you really don't know what to expect from your athletes, but overall I was happy with the result."

Massachusetts took six place-finishes to Maine's nine, but it was the Minutemen's depth throughout their team that kept pace with the Black Bears.

"When you look at our team, you have to say that our strength is that we don't have too many weaknesses," O'Brien said. "We may not have too many blue chip-type front runners but we outscored them in second and third places to make up for their first places."

Senior Tom Galligani picked up one of those first places in the triple jump, with a 43' 8-1/2." The same Galligani who was selected to the All Academic A-10 Indoor Track team for the second year in a row.

O'Brien's sees more than just Galligani's athletic performance in his importance to the team.

"Tommy has been our leading scorer for the team the four years he has been here," O'Brien said. "I can't down play the importance of the points he scores, but he has a greater importance on this team. He takes interest in the other kids performances and helps to encourage them further."

"So he not only puts his points on the table, he helps bring other kids who score more points."

Also receiving the distinction with Galligani was junior Eric Nadeau. Saturday, Nadeau finished second in the 5000 meters with a time of 15:05.

Newcomers were also a strength to the teams output in the quad-meet. Freshman Brandon Tutt grabbed a first and a second-place finish in the meet. He recorded a winning time of 57.9 in the 400m Hurdles and placed second behind Galligani in the triple jump.

Other key contributions to the teams scoring were juniors Marc Lefebvre and Bob Dalton. Lefebvre scored in two events to help the Minutemen's cause, taking third in the shotput and fourth in the discus. Dalton threw the hammer 30 feet further than he ever had before, grabbing third in the event.

While Tutt won the low hurdles, fellow freshman Chris Conner followed up by winning the 400m with a time of 51.7.

Two seniors rounded out the Minutemen's first place finishers, as seniors Paul Doyle (100m Hurdles) and John Johnson (100m) won their respective events. The UMass 4 x 100 relay team also placed first.

The team will remain on campus this weekend when Boston College and Boston University travel to a Amherst for a tri-meet.

MJ's return good not for hoop only

Arthur Stapleton, Jr.

Baseball is back without him and basketball is with him. Michael Jordan has a new number. He has new teammates. He has a new basketball life. The same old Air is back in the National Basketball Association, dunking on people, gracefully answering every question thrown at him by all the eager reporters, even winning games at the buzzer.

Members of the media planted themselves in front of a television set watching MJ's return in the Knickerbocker Arena, instead of sitting in their courtside seats to report on the second round of the NCAA tournament. They wanted to see if he could score 50 points again. They wanted to be able to tell the world that Jordan shouldn't have come back, that once you retire, stay out for good.

What some people don't realize is that Jordan not only saved the sport of professional basketball, but the world of sports in general. With one fell swoop, he did something that he probably did not intend to do — put the entire sports world back on track.

Think of all the pain and suffering we've sustained as sports fans since MJ left the game of hoops. Strikes off the field, not on it; crybabies on the court, not just off of it; Donald Fehr and Richard Ravitch; Bob Goodenow and his cronies; O.J. Simpson.

Sports lost its fun on almost every level when Jordan took off his No. 23 and opted for cleats and a baseball glove. Eventually, two professional leagues went down the tubes because of labor problems, fans were losing interest in the sportsworld rapidly and focusing on issues that truly didn't belong on the back pages of newspapers — not because they didn't exist, just that the issues involved transcended athletics.

Trials and tribulations were taking center stage. The biggest sports story in 1994 was a high-speed chase between a former NFL great in a Bronco and the long arm of the law — here was sports over the past two years in a nutshell.

Then, something happened. MJ floated above it all like he did many times before, as his No. 23 made its way to the rafters in the United Center. Jordan rose atop the sports world, the mess that it was, and decided to come back down to earth after months of contemplation.

He left basketball when he wasn't having fun anymore; without him, we weren't enjoying the games anymore. In all of his splendor, whether you love him or loathe him, MJ put the sport back in sports.

So he made some extra cash by keeping the No. 23 in mothballs and forcing all the fans to buy brand-spanking new No. 45 jerseys. Who cares if he came back because he needed the money? Too many commercials? So what.

A lot of adoring fans think Jordan is larger than life. Others argue that he is just an athlete — no more, no less. Since he came back to basketball, both the sport he departed and the sport he has rejoined have been rejuvenated. The sportsworld is getting exciting again.

They say that no man is bigger than the sport, yet Jordan is pretty damn close. Maybe he is a god.

Lianne Laing turns fall into a success

Gymnast stepping it up this season for Minutewoman gym

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

There are the individuals that mark the standard for the success in every team sport. They perform consistently at a top level throughout the season.

But along the line, a team needs that special athlete to step up from the pack, to show the sports world that they have something to prove.

The University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team has an athlete who has stepped it up a couple of notches this season in sophomore Lianne Laing.

Expected to be a event by event contributor this preseason, she has now become an all around frontrunner with her latest award of UMass Athlete of the Week for March 26. With that stellar performance at the Atlantic 10 Championships two weekends ago, which included setting a school record on vault (9.950) and a fourth place overall score of 38.475, the award only backs up with what has been true all along — Laing's time has come.

Joining her teammates sophomore Tara Swartz and junior J.J. Tolhurst in the all around competition, the future looks bright for UMass, as they will have three top athletes ready for the NCAA Regionals on April 8.

"The team has come together really well this year, and we have one more meet to come together strong," Laing said. "We really do have a chance [to win], but we all need to nail our routines."

The road to Laing's gymnastics career began in two atmospheres that were different than her fellow teammates. For one, the place north of the border where she calls home, Ottawa, Canada; secondly, the way she was raised in and around the sport.

Contrary to the club competition format that most gymnasts start with, Laing's began with her mother being head coach of a gymnastics school. The gym was there all her life, and it just happened through trial and error that she had a knack for it.

With the ten years of care and scrutinizing insight of a parent wanting her daughter to do the best, Laing grew into the shoes of a future Athlete of the Year in 1986, two-time Provincial Champion (1987 and 1990) and National Championship competitor (placing third in floor and vault).

Laing attributes the influence of her mother, and the experience of this time period, to what she is as a person and athlete today. The fear factor that has bothered her in the past has now begun to dissipate, and she feels in total control of her athletic life.

"When I won the Provincial Championships, it really gave me something that made me feel good about myself inside, and that I could accomplish and set goals," Laing said. "From there, the more I did well at things, the more I wanted to push myself.

"I owe a lot of this to my mother, she has been a great inspiration to me."

In her two years at UMass, it has been a hectic and overwhelming experience. This season, the wins over perennial A-10 foe and No. 21 West Virginia, and the injury-riddled No. 9 Penn State, show a important transition period for a team on the edge of the national spotlight.

In the team's win in Morgantown last Feb. 26, Laing set her then season-best on the vault. But the important thing is that it was the last event in UMass' rotation, and they were behind the Mountaineers going into it.

The 9.850 score not only got the first-place finish individually. But combined with her teammates, they together set the school record (48.750) and put the team over the

The University of Massachusetts ranked seventh in the first-ever Intercollegiate Figure Skating competition, based solely on the performance of one student.

Sara Zuckerman, a sophomore with an undeclared major, was the sole representative for UMass at the competition, which was held on March 25 at MIT's Howard W. Johnson Athletic Center.

Featuring intermediate through senior-level competition, the event drew more than 30 skaters from 11 colleges in the New York and New England area.

Zuckerman said she competed in the senior free skating event, earning six points for the University. Skaters are awarded points in each event, depending on where they placed in competition, with six being the highest.

The school with the total number of points at the end of competition is awarded the Challenge Trophy. The University of Vermont, which brought six skaters, who each competed in two events, brought the trophy home this year.

"They could gain more credit for the trophy [with six skaters] than me by myself," Zuckerman said. UMass almost had three figure skaters at the event, but circumstances forced the other two to cancel.

She said this was the first competition of its kind held on the collegiate level and she thinks there will be more in the future because the organizers saw "the good turnout" for the first.

"Figure skating is such a young sport that college kids are really over the hill for competition," Zuckerman said. "Hopefully this will open up a whole new area."

The event was sanctioned by the United States Figure Skating Association and was open to all skaters currently enrolled as a full-time student at any accredited college or university.

Patricia Hagedorn, one of the organizers for the event, said it allowed figure skaters on the collegiate level to continue skating.

"People spend a tremendous amount of time learning [to figure skate]," Hagedorn said. "It's such a shame to waste that."

She said she was pleased with the outcome of the first competition and hopes it will continue to grow, but sees student figure skaters as a key.

"Once kids go off to college, we don't want them to forget about figure skating," she said.

Zuckerman said they are looking around for other places to hold the competition in upcoming years. Even if UMass wished to sponsor the event, they would have to pay Ogden Enterprises, the outside corporation which runs the William D. Mullins Center.

Zuckerman, 20, transferred to UMass this year from UVM. She hails from various towns in Connecticut and has been figure skating since the age of four. Once a week, she commutes down to Simsbury, Conn., to train at the International Skating Center of Connecticut, also training grounds for professional gold medalist Oxsana Bauhail.

She said she has recently been focusing a lot more on coaching, and she is a trial judge and coach for the Skating Club of Amherst.

Plans to try and start a skating club at the University are in the works for Zuckerman, but she said she is overloaded with work this semester.

"I know a lot of skaters at UMass," she said.

Zuckerman plans to compete in the National Collegiate Figure Skating Championships this summer in Colorado Springs, Colo.

Report says state U's in need of major reform

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

While the University of Massachusetts' Amherst campus ranks at the top of the state system for research, a recently released report said it must improve undergraduate education, and that the entire system must better prepare itself for increasing numbers of minority students.

The 60-page report, "Turnabout Time: Public Higher Education in the Commonwealth," released in March, looks at the 29 public institutions of higher learning in Massachusetts and supports an analysis as to what can be done to improve higher education throughout the state.

Interviews were conducted with former Provost Glen Gordon, state Sen. Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst), state Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst) and Chancellor David K. Scott. A University student focus group was also involved.

The Amherst campus was cited as the best source of graduate research throughout the UMass system, but was criticized for not servicing undergraduates' academic needs sufficiently, relative to the Boston and Dartmouth campuses.

"The faculty members give UMass-Amherst the lowest rating in the system for how well it does in providing assistance to students with weak academic backgrounds, promoting intellectual development of the students and producing well-educated graduates," according to the report.

"On the other hand, Amherst faculty give the institution the highest ratings in the system as a place to train graduate students and conduct basic and applied research, as well as for having faculty who publish and produce scholarly and creative documents."

The report stipulates that with the state's changing demographics producing a larger minority contingency, the educational system needs to work at increasing its efforts to enhance retention and completion rates by directing resources toward student support services and possibly retraining teachers.

Gov. William F. Weld responded to the report last week by stating that regardless of the findings, he expects UMass to be strong in both undergraduate education and research.

"I think we need to focus with considerable intensity on making sure that we're preparing people for jobs in the real world," Weld said. "But I don't think you have to put research on the back burner to do that."

The report suggests that the administration take on a realistic set of ideals and make necessary reforms throughout the system, by possibly consolidating and closing some of the campuses down. The report did not cite what campuses would be targeted.

Their solutions were detailed through five steps: mission redefinition and curricular reform, new professional criteria for faculty and an effective retirement plan, consolidation among the state colleges, collaboration between the public and private sectors of education in the state and a renewed commitment to access and financial stability.

Last week, UMass President Michael K. Hooker criticized the report for undermining research efforts by putting emphasis on increasing the quality of undergraduate instruction.

"[The report] fails to recognize that one of the important roles of a public university is to provide focused research in areas that will support the region or the state," Hooker said.

The report was produced by the John W. McCormack Institute of Public Affairs at UMass-Boston as an elaborate analysis. Robert C. Wood, a former UMass president, was one of three co-authors of the piece.

The report states that "its aim is to help set the stage for a public policy debate on higher education comparable to those which occurred 30 years ago around the legislative initiatives of that era."

The Associated Press contributed to this article.

Tuition stable, fees to increase

DARTMOUTH (AP) — Tuition at the University of Massachusetts will not increase next year, though student fees will rise between 3 percent and 23 percent, the universities' trustees decided Wednesday.

Some part of the student fee increase would be reversed if the state Legislature allocates more money this year than it did last year to the universities, the trustees promised.

Student fees represent about half the cost of attending the five state universities. They would increase 3 percent at the flagship Amherst campus, to $2,092 for undergraduates who are Massachusetts undergraduates. Tuition would remain at $2,220.

At UMass-Boston, resident undergraduate tuition also would remain at $2,220. Fees would rise 6.5 percent, to $1,896. Resident undergraduates at the Dartmouth campus would continue to pay $1,836 in tuition, but their fees would go up 14 percent to $1,953. Non-resident undergraduates at Dartmouth face a 23 percent fee hike, to $2,967.

Tuition at UMass-Lowell would stay at $1,884 for resident undergraduates, while fees would rise about 5 percent to $2,775. And at the UMass Medical School in Worcester, tuition would continue to be $8,792 for medical students and fees would increase 25 percent to $1,250.

The announcement follows the release of a five-year plan under which the universities would seek to raise admission standards and lower dropout rates.

Under the plan, presented Tuesday, the universities would seek to raise the average standardized test score of entering freshmen by 56 points on the Amherst campus, 98 points on the Lowell campus. The schools would try to lower the freshman dropout rate by at least 5 percent, meaning that about 25 percent of freshmen still would be expected to leave before their sophomore year - about the national average.

SGA speaker resigns, Darby steps up

By Marnie Thomel
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association (SGA) Speaker Mercedes Betanco resigned from her three-year position last night, handing the gavel to Associate Speaker Tom Darby.

Darby was sworn in as speaker and the senate passed a motion on the second try to allocate funding to the Asian American Student Association (AASA).

Betanco said she was resigning "due to personal reasons."

The former speaker received a standing ovation as she thanked those she worked with, reminding the senate that she would still be around.

"I would like to thank ... all the great senators I got to know," Betanco said. "I hope you have good intentions and take it seriously."

Betanco and Darby were co-respondents in a claim brought before the Student Judiciary three weeks ago by Student Attorney General Phil McNamara.

Senate continued as planned and some members of the Asian Community came to push for funding for the 12th annual Asian Cultural Night.

The proposal was petitioned to the SGA in February and AASA had yet to receive a response, according to Ji Lee, co-producer of Asian Night.

The original motion proposed $3,000 for the event but failed after debate.

"I think that $3,000 is a lot of money," said Senator Bill Ramsey. "If we pass this, we are setting a precedent that any group can get this money."

The motion was modified and brought before the senate again, requesting $2,500 instead of $3,000.

"We are getting desperate," said Lee during debate on the second motion. "If we don't get this funding, then we can't have this event."

The money for Asian Night will be taken from a short term reserve account, according to secretary of finance Sean Carter.

"If someone goes into debt, that's what the short term account is there for," Carter said.

The account balance is currently $5,500, and the money is not used often, according to Betanco, who remained for the meeting.

"It is very rarely that this account is touched," she said. "It's a great event and it is incredible to see how much work is put into it."

"It's fantastic, I am very happy right now," Lee said when the motion passed.

"This is the event of events at the University of Massachusetts. It is so special because we have all ethnic groups involved in the show," Lee said. "I hope we can give the whole entire University the best show to understand the nature of Asian culture and what is behind it."

State proposes funding cuts aimed toward K–12 education

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The State House Ways and Means committee budget proposal has included additional state lottery aid but has cut more than $50 million in the state education kindergarten through 12th grade (K–12) reform bill.

The $50 million is part of $200 million put into the bill to cover inflation costs. House Ways and Means committee chairman, Tom Finneran (D–Mattapan), has proposed a retreat on the inflation adjustment, said state Rep. Ellen Story (D–Amherst).

"Nothing else in the budget has inflation built into it," Story said. "Basically, he thought we couldn't afford it."

The current education reform bill's purpose is to bring every district up to a foundation budget that would increase with inflation, add new curriculum for students and increase teacher accountability be requiring recertification every five years, said Stephen K. Wollmer, director of communications for the Massachusetts Teachers Association.

The money allocated to each town has not been calculated yet so the effect to Amherst is unknown, said select board chairman Bryan Harvey.

"It's probably going to be a very substantial amount of money," Harvey said. "It's pretty significant."

Surprise cuts

The cuts came as a surprise to many. Those in the state legislature had been promising voters they would not cut any money from the education reform bill, said Alice Carlozzi, chair of the town finance committee.

"I guess the K–12 people haven't been making enough of a fuss," Harvey said.

The town of Amherst was expecting about $300,000 in cuts to state lottery aid. Instead, the proposal has cut approximately $200,000, said Guss Sayer, superintendent of Amherst schools.

"We were planning for a bigger cut than that," Carlozzi said. "We ended up a little better than the finance committee expected us to."

Because of the increased lottery aid, Amherst elementary schools would fare well but the Amherst Regional School would be hit with a $70,000 cut, Sayer said.

Tree removals anger some faculty

By Emily Gold
Collegian Correspondent

Employees in Stockbridge Hall said they were shocked and angered Wednesday when chainsaws cut four beloved chestnut trees in front of the building to stumps.

The four horse chestnut trees that were cut down gave shade to warm offices and housed many animals, including a hawk, according to those who work in the building.

However, the trees also posed a safety hazard to those walking by, said the director of Stockbridge School of Agriculture.

Employees often ate lunch and smoked at a picnic table under the trees, which brought fresh chestnuts and blossoms in the spring, said Gisela Walker, an extension specialist in the Water Quality Program.

"People loved seeing the squirrels that run up and down the trees," said Walker, who works in the building.

According to Harry Mosher, director of the Stockbridge School of Agriculture, the four trees could have fallen at any time.

Because of this, the decision to cut down the four trees was authorized by Robert Helgeson, dean of the College of Food and Natural Resources, said Mosher.

"When trees are in an area that has a lot of traffic you get concerned that at some point they can snap off and kill somebody," Mosher said.

The chestnut trees, which had lived near the building for 40 years, were beginning to decline with age, Mosher said.

"There comes a time in every tree's life when it begins to decline," Mosher said. "People's lives are worth more than aesthetics."

Walker said she agreed that the trees posed a potential danger, but said less severe options were not explored.

"The feeling I have is that it was administratively easy to do it this way," said Walker. "I don't think they had any idea how attached people were to these trees."

For safety, the dead areas could have been trimmed and plant laboratories may have helped, Walker said.

"We do not know how well they researched the decision," she said.

"Decisions were made by people who have no vested interest in the University," said Paula Burgielewicz , a clerk in Stockbridge Hall. "The way things get done around here, it is like nobody cares."

Jo Anh Duda, a bookkeeper who works in the building, said she did not have any idea that the trees would be cut.

"We came in yesterday and we heard the chainsaws," Duda said. "We were all very surprised to see this happening."

The trees were the last of their kind on campus, said Burgielewicz. She said that landscape architects on campus were not notified of the decision.

According to biology professor David Mulcahy, the horse chestnut tree is not rare. "I'm sorry they were cut down, but they are not rare," he said. "It is just a nice tree."

What do you think about the Contract With America?

"I think it is an incorrect representation of what Americans really want. Twenty-three percent of eligible voters voted in the election that Republicans are taking as a mandate. It is taking resources away from where they are needed, and giving them to the rich, once again."

BURKE SAMPSON
senior, anthropology
Northampton

"It's a good example of what happens when people forget that they've got a responsibility as a citizen in a democracy to act, to be involved, to vote, write letters, to speak out and be heard."

BARRY TUCKER
alumnus
Leverett

"It is racist, anti-humanitarian, anti-working and poor class. It is based on placing blame on welfare recipients rather than the wealthier class — the right wingers that have access to the resources. They are focusing on the middle class; in actuality, it is going to be detrimental to the middle class."

SIENNA LOFTUS
senior, anthropology
Great Falls, Mont.

"I think the Contract With America is a cunning, conservative device aimed at hurting the poor, women, students, minorities, etc. and benefiting the rich businesses. It is preposterous."

CHRIS MASTERMAN
senior, philosophy
Providence, R.I.

"I really don't think that much about it at all. I don't agree with it, just from what I have heard. I don't think it will help a lot of minorities. I don't really know specifics, I want to form my own opinion."

CARLOS J. FIGUEROA
junior, Latin American history, education
Worcester

"It is pretty good overall. Welfare cuts is an excellent idea. They should take people out and make them work. It benefits the middle class; for example with welfare, taxes won't be spent on people who don't want to work. I think it will help our society overall."

DOUG DOWLING
junior, environmental design
Marthos Vineyard

"I think people need to learn more about it. I think it may sound good, but we need to look at the fine print. I don't think the majority agree with it. If people would educate themselves about it, they would learn that it does not help everyone in the U.S. only a small segment."

A positive female role model

Laura Schmidt

I was recently invited to "Crossworlds in Conversation," with Maya Angelou and Elie Wiesel at the Mullins Center on March 28.

Throughout listening to this lyrical conversation with the famous African-American poet and the Jewish writer, the powerful language of both scholars seized my attention. Many times, their conversation left me stunned, as if I had just read a beautiful piece of poetry.

Elie Wiesel, a professor at Boston University and survivor of the Holocaust, opened my mind to acknowledgment of the need to abolish hatred.

Maya Angelou, the first Reynolds Professor of American Studies at Wake Forest University, emphasized the importance of education, reading and writing.

As I listened to these speakers, I found myself internalizing and relating their hopes and dreams to mine — to become a journalist.

It was at this point that I most identified myself, and realized what influential new role models I had indeed found, especially in Angelou.

Angelou, like myself, is a woman who believes education is vital while stressing the primacy of reading and writing. I now was reassured that my passion for writing was important not only for my career, but for my inner development as well.

Today, almost all too often, aspiring journalists hear comments like, "What are you going to do with a journalism degree?" or "So, your major is easy, huh?"

It was comments such as these that recently had been clouding my aspirations, leaving me dreading graduation and the future.

Someone I once knew a while back constantly told me, in his own subtle way, that I was enrolled in a "joke" major and his mathematical major deserved more attention than mine.

Now I regret to say that at that point, I considered changing my major, giving up journalism completely.

How glad I am now that my attitude changed.

Everything took a turn for the better when I became more independent and involved in my major — in and outside the classroom.

The passion I always had for writing was slowly revived.

It is now, when I begin to doubt myself as a journalist, that I am reminded of a passage written by Angelou:

"However I am perceived and deceived however my ignorance and concerts lay aside your fears that I will be undone, for I shall not be moved."

This passage, taken from I Shall Not Be Moved, strongly reinforces my interest to become a journalist. It screams "you can do it, and do not let anyone tell you differently," but more importantly it says, "I am a women like you who will someday succeed."

My definition of a role model is a person who possesses the very same qualities and successes you are striving toward, or may even be struggling toward achieving.

Angelou, a female poet, best-selling author, educator, playwright, and certainly much more, is a most influential and prominent role model of mine today. Her positive encouragement and most impressive way with words destroyed any lingering doubts of my pursuit as a journalist.

It has been proven somewhere that college-age students are the most idealistic candidates to influence with ideas. After all, they have, or are supposed to have, an open mind, right?

If this is true, it then becomes our responsibility to expose ourselves to the ideas and thoughts of people like Angelou rather than giving in to a society which has already lost too much of its hope for achieving individual dreams.

It is time to say farewell to the people who will knock you down, and say hello to those who will put you back together again.

Learning nothing at UMass

Beth Levrault

"I don't get it."

"What? What number are we on?"

"What does that mean?"

I sat silently in the third row of my review session, my mind a jumble and my emotions a tidal wave of anger. Bewildered students surrounded me, their questions either not being asked or not being answered.

I now understand why so many UMass students learn absolutely nothing in their entire college career. Sure, it seems logical that a little initiative might help students go beyond the professor's lecture and learn something on their own, but the United States has not always been famous for encouraging youth to work hard. It seems to me the U.S. educational system is not based on Individualism and personal effort, but on simply learning a right answer as opposed to a "wrong" one.

What's worse, in our early lives in school, the students who can simply learn how to spit out the right answers on cue are deemed the "smart" ones and therefore are given the most personal attention. These students sometimes are the ones who ultimately do succeed simply because they are given the chance to, while students who don't like to memorize end up falling behind.

At UMass, I see not much else but a recurrence of this same idea. And I don't think we can really blame these students for trying to simply find the right answers to questions, the ones that professors want, instead of trying to go for an answer strictly from their own thought processes — even though this might benefit them in the end. In a society such as this, where numbers and perfect resumes mean more than personality and actual ability, in a world where test scores may determine a person's admission to graduate school and therefore, the direction of his/her life — who can blame students for going for the grade instead of the learning?

At one point in this so-called review session, I raised my hand and expressed these feelings, maybe somewhat vehemently. Indicating the answer the teaching assistant had just written on the board, I said, "I don't understand any of that." I expected this TA to help me understand the mish- mash of words he had just written, and he sort of did that.

But his phrases were overloaded with explanations of words I could not understand in other words I could not understand. Sort of like looking up a word in the dictionary and then having to look up words in the definition, then having to look up words in that definition, and so on...

As I sat though this hour-long review session while the teaching assistant quietly and methodically wrote down on the board the answers given to him by the professor and then simply restated them verbally, I felt a certain anger welling up inside.

I really wanted to learn. I wanted to know more about the functions and processes we were learning about, not only for myself, but to better my ability to help others in my future career.

In response to a question by a student, the teaching assistant quite calmly said, "Well, I really don't know what the professor means by that." I was shocked. If even he didn't understand it, how did he expect us, students who had never seen anything like this before, to make any sense out of it either? It's bad enough to teach students strings of words with no meaning to the students, but it's even worse if no one else can explain it either.

What I'm trying to say is that learning is not just memorization. A professor can't simply use complex phrases or scientific jargon like it's everyday talk and expect a student to understand it without the basics. Even worse, to give ambiguously written, pre-programmed answers to questions without adequate explanation of the meaning of the phrases. Just because you can spit out the right answer doesn't always mean you understand it, as those infamous multiple-guess tests can prove. This particular test wasn't going to be multiple choice, but it still was the same-old recognition-type of learning. What it amounted to was a review session of "here is the question ... here is the answer." And none of the answers really made any sense.

Needless to say, after about an hour of this, I was extremely frustrated. I felt like tearing up the intricate, detailed answers I had prepared in response to the study guide. I felt like they were worth nothing, in light of the half-effort, half-explained answers given by the TA that were supposed to be correct. I found myself studying these half-answers later on, discarding my detailed notes. In anticipation of the glorified "A," I sacrificed my own efforts in my own major and learned the words the professor wanted me to regurgitate. I understood some of them, but not as many as I would have liked. Sure, a high GPA is a blessing, but it's pretty sad when a student has to learn less to achieve that high number.

So much for critical thinking.

Notes from the Basement

The wait has begun. Again. It's that time of the year in the Valley and UPC is keeping its collective mouth shut as far as who's coming for Spring Concert. This reporter is curious and has heard some things, all unconfirmed mind you, so one can pretty much classify the information as rumor.

However, I like to make a habit out of telling certain organizations what to do, so here it goes again. Blues Traveler is the hot commodity and has been the first group mentioned in the Basement as far as the Spring Concert is concerned. They're a name band and they go well with the mud near the pond. Ink 'em, baby.

Take Blues Traveler and the Allman Brothers, who may also be coming, and you have as good of a one-two punch as I've seen at UMass in a long time. The Allman Bros. are as old as the W.E.B. Du Bois Library, but they are still cool — that's only if they sing "Melissa" and "Blue Sky."

From South Carolina to Amherst? The route has been traveled on before by students and I want to see Hootie and the Blowfish do it themselves. Hootie is currently touring with Toad the Wet Sprocket in Ohio; here's some food for thought — if Toad is coming to Mount Holyoke later this month, why not Hootie at UMass?

Sign the Judybats. Hey, I've never heard one second of their music, but they must be better than the Violent Femmes. From what I hear, da 'Bats put on a good live show and do nasty covers of songs by the Bee Gees. Plus, they're cynical, just like me. I don't even care if they leave Judy at home.

A local fave? How 'bout Meristem? UPC is good for at least one band from the area and they're as solid as any of them.

Who won't be coming to Spring Concert? Pearl Jam, U2, Counting Crows, Sheryl Crow, the Black Crowes, Cameron Crowe (I know he's not a singer, I'm just testing you), The Crow, R.E.M., Run D.M.C., Jimmy Buffett and Bruce Springsteen. Sorry — they won't return my calls.

Here's an open plea to John Calipari:

The Massachusetts men's basketball program could make a big statement as far as history is concerned by retiring both Lou Roe and Derek Kellogg's jerseys. Take No. 15 and No. 14, hang them from the rafters at the William D. Mullins Center and I will, as a senior at this University, support it 100 percent.

For the last two seasons, the Minuteman co-captains have been pointed to by Calipari as the figureheads of the program. Yes, Jim McCoy's No. 20, the jersey of the school's all-time leading scorer, should be up as well, but this is 1995.

No one will fight the retirement of Roe's legacy, but you ask him if he'll mind Kellogg joining him, and the All-American probably won't disagree. Some people say Kellogg doesn't have the statistics to be honored like this. O.K., I agree — make a statement for your program.

Are you saying that the only way to get your number retired is to donate money to the University or achieve All- American status? I sure hope not. Putting Kellogg in the rafters will not take anything away from Roe's accomplishments as a player here in Amherst. Julius Erving is honored in the same light as Trigger Burke, and Dr. J doesn't have a problem with it.

Derek Kellogg has done as much for this University as the Trigger did, hasn't he?

Harvey Smilovitz of WFSB-Hartford had the quote of the week, in reference to the Connecticut women's basketball team and the Huskies' undefeated season. The sports director on the CBS affiliate was at the welcome home party and talked about how the 9,000 fans in Gampel Pavilion Monday night appreciate the championship Huskies.

"Every single person in this building tonight would love the opportunity to hug each and every one of those players and tell them how much they love 'em," he said.

Umm, please, Harv. That says something about the state of Connecticut. Oh, by the way, thanks for pre-empting the entire 40-minute national championship pre-game show and showing the Husky celebration live, beginning at 8 p.m.

Could you please get me WBZ, please?

We here in the Basement have been receiving complaints about workers at the Coffee Shop and the Hatch not wearing plastic gloves while making and serving food. Well, I ain't gonna accuse people of anything, but make sure you wash your hands before you touch my Golden Boy or my slice of Hatch pizza. Thanks.

Letters to the Editor

British had major role in violence

To the editor:

In response to David Sherlock's reply to a previous editorial in the Collegian, he blames uninformed Americans for fueling the situation in Northern Ireland. Perhaps he should reflect on a few events first. The English initiated the problem when they invaded their island neighbor in the year 1150. They later fueled the fire with penal laws outlawing the native language and religion and denying them an education.

In the 1840s they attempted genocide on the population by demanding payments and exporting crops during the Potato Famine, halving the population. They then promised a temporary partition of the island after a native uprising. This unpopular line was to be drawn around the traditional nine counties of Ulster, but upon realizing that it would be in their best interest, the British amended it to surround only the six where they had a majority of implanted support. At the time, the Irish population as a whole voted by an overwhelming 8 percent for a unified, partitionless state. In fact, they elected Eamen Devalera into office again and again with the mandate of ending this partition, only to have the British government promise and then delay for 40 years.

David, the troubles were fueled by Protestant resistance to demands of equality by the Catholics, fueled by fears of the loss of entitlement. International and even British observers found widespread evidence of discrimination. British troops were sent to the North to "protect" marchers when the Unionists confronted them. However, these guardians soon revealed with whom their loyalties rested, and the I.R.A. was brought out of the closet to do the job these soldiers were supposed to do, protect. The ante was upped when, with their newfound military backing, the Unionists became increasingly belligerent to their hosts and the authorities increased what would be blatant violations of American constitutional rights. These actions created what was in essence a war zone with the allegiance of the 3,400 fatalities split down the middle.

You take exception with the author of the first article asking Irish Americans to raise a glass to Bobby Sands, who starved himself to death to protest English abuses in his homeland. You tell Americans to mind their own business. David, the fact that there is a period of peace right now is because Irish-Americans prompted Bill Clinton to finally realize the "special relation" we had with Great Britain is no longer so special, and he opened the door to negotiations.

B-ball comparison doesn't work

To the editor:

To compare the treatment of college basketball players to slavery is like comparing the UMass men's basketball team to the team at St. Peters. It just doesn't work.

To suggest that members of NCAA teams should see a portion of the profits that they bring into a school is almost as crazy. Why not pay members of the University Marching Band for the shows they put on and all their practice time throughout the fall? They're nationally recognized, right?

I'll put it this way. I live 20 minutes from Marcus Camby in Tolland, Conn. I pay close to $17,000 dollars to attend this school.

He pays nothing. To me, that's about a $17,000 a year salary for five months of basketball and off season training. Does he deserve it? Sure, he worked hard for this scholarship like all other scholarship students so more power to him. But a salary on top of that? I don't think that is warranted.

Unfortunately we've unleashed a monster. Yes, we — not just Coach Calipari, the UMass athletic department, CBS, Dick Vitale, etc., but us. It's our money that is lining the pockets of College Basketball, Inc. Money that we give freely and gladly. Agreeing that non-professional athletes should earn a salary is just another progression from the athletic field to the U.S. marketplace.

We've already been brainwashed into thinking that pro athletes deserve millions for their "labor," now it seems we're ready to take that next step.

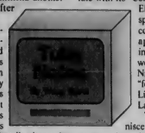
Tribute highlights TV week

Now that we've all finished swooning over Oscar-winning dumb guy and former sitcom staple Tom Hanks for awhile, I figure this is a good time to commend another TV legend who's coming up in the world after leaving his prime time days behind.



If you're like me, and you're still watching television at 3 a.m., than you've probably already been seduced by the 30-second ads for "The Philip Michael Thomas International Psychic Club." I, too, am intrigued by the prospect of claiming my share of the revered "Miami Vice" star's wisdom and guidance. I must admit that Thomas' ability to recite all of his lines with a straight face should alone stand as proof of the considerable acting talent that lies beneath his deceptively bland exterior. Who knows, in 10 years Philip may turn out to be another film superstar — the next century's Forrest Gump. Personally, I can't wait.

Speaking of giving actors their due, NBC came in a bit late with its "Comedy Salute to Andy Kaufman" last week. Eleven years after his untimely death, the special gathered clips from the comedian's controversial (and often confrontational) appearances on TV. Some of the more interesting footage showed Andy wrestling women, making trouble on the set of "Late Night with David Letterman" and creating a "foreign man" character on "Saturday Night Live" — which gradually evolved into the Latka Gravas role he later played on "Taxi."

Various celebrities dropped by to reminisce over the impact Kaufman had on their own work, and they included such respected performers

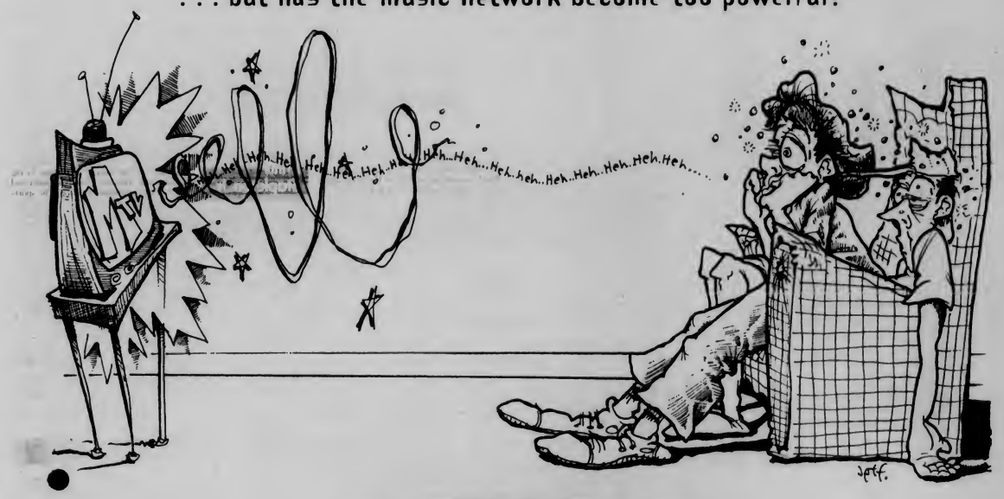
TUNE IN & DROP OUT

. . . but has the music network become too powerful?



By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

When MTV "Plugged in" to our lives via the new, exciting and commercial free (remember that?) frontier known as cable TV on Aug. 1, 1981 at 12:01 a.m., it's hard to imagine that anyone believed it would ever become so much more than just the sum of its parts (music + video). Fourteen years and an enormous amount of videos later, the phrase heard more often than "Have you heard that song?" is "Have you seen that video?"

MTV has certainly done a lot for the music video and as a result has effected even the way live music is presented. Those of us who aren't old enough to remember listening to music without an accompanying video can only imagine what the music industry was like without the MTV machine.

What has MTV accomplished? The music industry has been forever altered, but in what ways and to what ends? With the 15th anniversary of its debut only a little over a year away, it's time we look even closer than before at all the benchmarks, positive and negative, that MTV has left us with.

Key to marketing

"It has usurped radio as far as marketing music," said Gordon Maclaughlin, a University of Massachusetts graduate student and teaching assistant currently studying for his doctorate in English. Maclaughlin has often utilized MTV in some of his classes on film and culture.

"MTV has stepped up the visual representation of music — before all you had was the album cover," he said.

Sut Jhally, communications professor and producer of the film Dream Worlds and its sequel, which examine how MTV presents women, shares this view of MTV as a marketing tool.

"You still need radio to sell records," Jhally said. "But I think that most record companies would say that MTV is key to their marketing."

Indeed, having a video for a song is a major factor in propelling a song to the top of the charts, or even in cracking the top 100 or new artist charts. Artists such as Pearl Jam, Neil Young and even the Grateful Dead have proved that MTV is not the sole marketing tool for their music by selling millions of records and packing in the crowds without its help. One also has to remember, however, that Young and the Dead were established artists before MTV arrived, and Pearl Jam is where it is today by becoming MTV poster children for a year.

"Videos are nothing more than ads," Jhally said. "It has made the visual element much more important."

"MTV is selling music with an image," Maclaughlin said. "It has become a struggle between art and commerce."

Breakthrough or eye candy?

Art is certainly a word that seldom pops up when speaking of MTV, and it's easy to forget that video-

> What has MTV accomplished? The music industry has been forever altered, but in what ways and to what ends?

making is indeed an art form, no matter what the motives may be for the band or record company. Through the early days, MTV didn't give us much more than a camera or two, trained the artists while they lip-synched their song in some silly outfit or in front of some bizarre backdrop. Future years saw great advances in videomaking with artists such as Talking Heads, Michael Jackson and Peter Gabriel giving us videos that not only made their songs extremely popular, but left us on our couches wondering, "How did they do that?"

"Directors on MTV end up setting the cutting edge standards of film," Maclaughlin said. "Videos are able to exploit a film technique that couldn't be done in a two-hour film."

At its annual video awards, MTV does give out an award for "Breakthrough" video of the year, but usually the number of videos nominated is only a few less than the entire number of videos given breakthrough status during the year. Recently, it has been Spike Jonze as well as several less-than-mainstream artists like Björk and Nine Inch Nails that have given us some of the most interesting, and often most disturbing videos.

"Videos are the equivalent of eye-candy," Maclaughlin points out. "Out of a whole year only a handful of videos will be challenging or breakthrough."

"MTV has cut down on imagination," Jhally said. "We listen to music through different filters, like where we were or what we were doing when we heard a song. Now it is very difficult not to think of the video once you've seen it."

Diamonds in the rough

Maclaughlin does see some potential in all of the media blitz MTV spits out, but it usually involves staying up late.

"Times that they think no one is watching they put on fantastic stuff," he said, referring to such shows as "Liquid Television" and "120 Minutes."

With 24 hours a day to fill, MTV could afford, however reluctantly, to give just about everyone some air-

People and Pop Culture in the News

Julia Roberts and Lyle Lovett have decided to call it quits. The only question that still goes unanswered is why they even bothered to get married in the first place.

Vampires of the night beware! A new breed of role- playing blood suckers have invaded over 100 U.S. cities. The Camarilla, an official vampire fan association, is like the Dungeon and Dragon games of old with a twist — instead of sitting around talking about action, this game is mobile.

Dan Zevin, author of Entry-Level Life: A Complete Guide to Masquerading as a Member of the Real World (a title aimed at would be graduates) cites Northampton as one of the slacker cities "living in the unreal world." Graduates who had hoped to remain in the Valley take heed ... 'cause if he wrote it, it must be true. Other cities listed include Burlington, Vt., and Prague, Czechoslovakia.

Two things that don't really need to exist: Anna Nicole Smith singing back up for Bruce Willis at another Planet Hollywood opening and "Medicine Ball," another medical show trying to usurp "ER." Doesn't every town in the country have a Planet Hollywood to call their own? And exactly what tent, ah, dress size has Miss Smith grown into?

Duran Duran has a new cover album out ... Sheena Easton has a new album out ... Susan Sherbert wrote a book illustrated with cats in medieval costumes.

Oscar tidbit! Sick of hearing about it? Wondering if the four hours was worth it? Well the show's producers did spare you the sight of John MacEnroe strumming on a guitar during girlfriend Patty Smyth's number despite being previously scheduled.

Pia Zadora is engaged for a second time to Jonathan Kaufer. The 38-year-old singer met her fiance at a film screening. James Cann is divorcing his wife Ingrid after four years, it was his third marriage. Suzanne Vega married music producer and keyboardist Mitchell Froom in New York City. The two plan to take their honeymoon in Paris.

Isabella Rossellini cancelled her wedding to Gary Oldman this past Christmas so he could complete a rehab program for alcoholism. The two now reside together in her Manhattan apartment with "no rush to exchange vows."

A bit of trivia: the monkey in Outbreak is also Marcel the monkey in "Friends." It's name? Monkey.

Video — Ed Wood

Though Ed Wood will soon be in video stores everywhere, it's far from the best effort from the team of director Tim Burton and star Johnny Depp. Ed Wood, for all of Oscar winner Martin Landau's sneaky charm and delicate pathos, was a bit too precocious for its own good — plus it seems to be about everything but Ed Wood.

Although it's also a sweet fairy tale about a guy named Ed, 1991's Edward Scissorhands is the better of the two. Constructing a '50s deco suburbia as intricate and integral as the gloomy Gotham City in Batman, Burton's comedy/ fantasy comes the closest to attaining a timeless, mythic feel. With Depp as the cutlery-for-hands hero and a blond-tressed Winona Ryder as his gentle love interest, Scissorhands unfolds its tale with satirical glee and swoony passion — it dares you to fall in love with it. There's also stellar support by Dianne Wiest, a cast-against-type Anthony Michael Hall and a Lugosi/Landau-esque cameo by Vincent Price.

TV — "The Critic"

There is no better show to follow "The Simpsons" on Sunday night than Jon Lovitz's "The Critic." Now on hiatus, the Fox sitcom is a perfect accompaniment to the wackiness of Bart and company. The show is centered around Jay Sherman (Jon Lovitz) and his show, "The Critic," where he reviews satirical sequels to popular films like Speed and Jurassic Park using "It stinks!" as his catch phrase to grade them.

Between movie reviews, viewers enter into Jay's life which involves assistant and southern belle Alice, his redneck producer Duke, and his shy sister Margo. Episodes include a hilarious parody of Oscar night, Margo falling in love with a rock star, and Jay going to fat camp. All these are wrapped into often bizarre and nonsensical situations that no matter how obscure and off kilter they seem somehow work. The humor is weird at best, but never boring and never repetitious. If FOX is smart they'll keep this show around.

Album — The Who

Twenty-five years ago, legendary rockers The Who took the stage in Leeds, England, for what would be one of the greatest live performances ever committed to tape. The result was released as Live At Leeds, but unfortunately was never heard by the world in its glorious entirety. Until now.

In celebration of the album's 25th anniversary, Live At Leeds as been released with the lost tracks that never made the original restored. The album has also been remastered and features extensive liner notes that give a song by song document of the classic live release.

The new and improved Live At Leeds includes such tracks as "I'm A Boy," "Substitute" and "Happy Jack," giving more prominence to lead singer Roger Daltrey's impressive vocal abilities.

The album paints a portrait of one of rock n' roll's most legendary bands at their prime, showing an intensity that has rarely been captured on a live recording.

GBV puts spin on classic rock

By Matt Audette

ALIEN LANES
Guided By Voices
Matador Records

Classic rock for the alternative nation? If Dayton, Ohio's Guided By Voices have their way this may not seem such a farfetched concept. For years now this raggedy bunch of 40-somethings have been creating some of the most glorious pop, disguised in the form of short bursts of lo-fi static.

Last year the band emerged from the basements of their homes (where most the of their music is recorded) and made a dash for the big time, thanks to heaps of favorable press and hearty endorsements from the likes of Kim Deal of The Breeders. Sounds like the makings of a band poised for "next big thing" status, doesn't it? Don't hold your breath. If the band's latest release, Alien Lanes, is any indication of the band's state of mind — fame and fortune may not be as close as one might think.

Akin to picking up transmissions from some unearthly radio broadcast that is as likely to play a Beatle-esque nugget one second and a Kiss power anthem the next, Alien Lanes highlights both the band's strong points, as well as their weak ones in one cohesive package.

While not as immediately appealing as last year's Bee Thousand, Alien Lanes finds GBV's usual "anything but the kitchen sink" style more scattered than ever. Like flipping through a radio dial, the 28 songs that make up the album come in short bursts (often as quick as 50 seconds), usually ending before the listener can even begin to digest what has happened. In the past this "verse-chorus-we're done" technique worked in GBV's favor. By tempting the listener with snippets of pop heaven, GBV left them in a startled daze, hungry for more.

On Alien Lanes this tactic doesn't work as well. The album is littered with way too many sound bites that are passed off as songs, almost as though the band couldn't come up with a finished product so they offered up little random bits and pieces instead.

This is not to say that Alien Lanes doesn't have its merits. When the group actually sits down to write a full-length song (which in their case rarely exceeds two minutes), the results are outstanding. Anything goes in the GBV camp and on Alien Lanes the band just about touches upon every rock style in the last 30 years. Look no further than Lennon/McCartney harmony on "As We Go Up, We Go Down" or the Buzzcock-style rave-up of "Little Whirl" for proof that no "rock" has been left unturned.

Of course, all this pop glory is wrapped up in enough hiss and static to make readers of Musician magazine suffer cardiac arrest, but in GBV's case (and I'm getting a feeling that they are well aware of this) the lo-fi style is half the fun. Often sounding as though they were recorded over the phone in the midst of an electrical storm, Alien Lanes carries on the GBV tradition of "the worse it sounds — the better." And in this case (believe in or not) this may actually be the saving grace of some of these songs.

Principal songwriter Robert Pollard probably writes most of these two-minute jingles while brushing his teeth, and on Alien Lanes this effortlessness shines through. Thankfully the poor recording of these tracks adds a dash of charm, often elevating them above the ranks of classic rock copy cats. Let's face it, GBV is not doing anything too revolutionary with song structures like many of their indie contemporaries, but rather they are digesting the history of rock and roll and spitting it out in their own, perverse image.

Despite all the hype, Alien Lanes isn't going to win GBV any new fans. The album is too schizophrenic and too erratic to be the band's ticket to stardom. Thus, hopefully keeping them out of the proper studio where their sound might become watered down, and instead keeping them where they belong — as alternative music's best kept secret. B+

The famed Broadway musical Guys and Dolls will dazzle the Valley for a one night only performance.

Acclaimed musical to play at FAC

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

1992's biggest Tony award–winning show is coming to the Valley.

Guys and Dolls, one of the best–loved musicals of all time, will make a stop at UMass for a one time only sold–out performance at the Fine Arts Center on Sunday, April 9 at 7 p.m.

Guys and Dolls will have you tapping your feet and humming along to popular numbers like "If I Were a Bell," "A Bushel and a Peck," "I've Never Been in Love Before," and the famous "Luck be a Lady," all by Pulitzer Prize–winning composer, lyricist and writer Frank Loesser.

The musical is based on the Damon Runyon short story, The Idyll of Miss Sarah Brown. Set in the 1950s, this fast– paced and swinging musical revolves around gamblers, Hot box cuties and noble soul–savers in New York City's Time Square.

In 1992 it won four Tony Awards: Best Revival of a Play or Musical, Best Direction of a Musical, Best Scenic Design and Best Actress in a Musical for Faith Prince as Adelaide. The show also received seven Drama Desk Awards, including Best Revival and three Outer Critics Circles Awards.

The well known cast of characters includes gambling addict Sky Masterson; frenzied crap game organizer Nathan Detroit; lady on a permanent mission, Miss Sarah Brown; and Hot box main attraction, Miss Adelaide.

Guys and Dolls opened on Broadway in 1950 running for 1,194 performances at the 46th Street Theater. The 1955 film version included Marlon Brando, Vivian Blaine, Frank Sinatra and Jean Simmons.

Tom Gearhart from the Toledo Blade wrote, "When it comes to romance, comedy and tuneful songs, nothing can beat the Runyonland of Guys and Dolls, a show that, after thousands of productions in hallowed theaters and high school auditoriums alike, remains as fresh now as it was 40 years ago."

Guys and Dolls is presented by the Fine Arts Center in conjunction with WHMP 1400, WGGB-TV 40, the Jewish Weekly News, Holyoke Mall at Ingleside and Fleet Bank.

Tank Girl diverges from comic

By Michael Pessah
Collegian Staff

TANK GIRL
Directed by Rachel Talalay with Lori Petty, Ice–T
Playing at Hampshire Six

Much like the name it shares with the lead character, the film Tank Girl is equal parts cute and annoying. Though it is based on Jamie Hewlett and Alan Martin's deliciously nasty comic, the film is little more than a fun harmless confection.

The premise is so familiar that the film barely makes an attempt to explain it. In a narration that abruptly ends 20 minutes into the film, Tank Girl (Lori Petty) explains: "The year is 2023, the world is screwed..." She proceeds to explain the situation with a boring familiarity — as if she were reading us the instructions on the back of a bottle of shampoo.

For the neophytes, the scenario involves a post–apocalyptic earth with a water shortage (which seems odd, considering the physiques of the cast). Most of the remaining water is controlled by the bad guys at W.P. (Water & Power). When W.P. catches Tank Girl stealing water, they shoot her ox and her hunky boyfriend. The rest of the movie consists of her travails fighting the oppressive W.P.

Petty's demure roles in the TV series "Booker" and the film A League of Their Own suggest that she is an odd choice to portray the savage, punk heroine. She is, in fact, a kinder, gentler tank girl and she seems to have take the grrrl out the role, consisting of equal parts Susan Powter, Cindy Lauper and Pee Wee Herman.

She is never particularly menacing, and she spends most of her time mugging at the camera and making cutesy wisecracks. Though diffusing violent situations with humor can be an effective breath of humanity (Schwarzenegger's perfection of this technique led him to stardom), Petty's character is so lacking in threat that her comments are just annoying.

The entire film suffers from similar timidity. This is surprising, considering it was directed by Rachel Talalay, who also directed the particularly mean–spirited adaptation of Stephen King's Pet Semetery. For example, much is made of the mysterious creatures known as the rippers. The most gruesome moment of Tank Girl is when we see a W.P. convoy that has been massacred by these creatures. When Tank Girl stumbles upon the rippers' base, they turn out to be little more than Bill and Ted dressed up in fuzzy kangaroo costumes. Tank Girl's exploits with the rippers end up looking like outtakes from Beetlejuice, and are neither scary or amusing. It seems as if the screenplay were written for youngsters — Teenage Mutant Ninja Kangaroos.

Tank Girl gets similarly cold feet when it comes to the key issue of its sexual politics. Initially, it appears that the film aspires to celebrate Tank Girl's simplistic sexual empowerment. Though the concept of a woman strapping on a tank and waving it at her oppressors smacks of cocktail party feminism, it could be a fun subtext for an action movie to have.

Here Tank Girl's failure is twofold. Not only does it bring this silly metaphor to the foreground (do we really need to see her straddle the gun barrel to the tune of "Shaft"?), but it also frequently subverts itself. Tank Girl spends most of her time on the defensive, never attacking until she is cornered. Often in the film she finds herself getting rescued by one of the peripheral male characters, doing little but looking pretty for the camera and making a spunky remark.

Tank Girl seems to embody a more general irreverence than anything that could be construed as "feminist." Tank Girl appears to wear her "empowerment" as a fashion statement, like her rocket–shaped bra, to be switched on and off whenever the plot calls. In one memorable scene, Tank Girl swoops into a brothel to liberate its sex slaves. Her rescue mission is sidetracked, however, when she feels the irrepressible urge to peruse the brothel's clothing selection. In a montage sequence lifted from Pretty Woman, Tank Girl dances in front of the camera in a variety of lascivious attire. Petty ceases to be Tank Girl, and instead assumes the role of riot grrrl Barbie.

Not that the world of Tank Girl is one of utter inequality. Talalay has created an atmosphere where everyone is an equal opportunity exploiter. Prison guards exploit their prisoners, Tank Girl exploits her own sexuality, and rape isn't far from any of the characters' minds. In this atmosphere, guns seem to be mandatory sexual equipment. Unfortunately, this disturbing theme is constantly being played up for cheap humor. By both acknowledging and dismissing this innuendo, Tank Girl succeeds in being neither commentary nor comedy.

In an attempt to put a '90s twist on the blaxploitation film, United Artists has created the first femsploitation film in Tank Girl. Petty does little more than strut around in hip clothing, play with her big gun and occasionally fight "the man." Tank Girl, however, lacks the crude repugnance that made films like Superfly such guilty pleasures. Tank Girl might want to be a bad ass, but instead is surprisingly timid. Though filled with intoxicating promises, it goes down like non–alcoholic beer. C+ time. And when "120 Minutes" debuted on March 10, 1986, no one would ever have guessed that a few years down the road the show would become the catalyst for the entire Seattle and alternative movements.

Up until Nirvana's "Smells Like Teen Spirit" aired, the show gave fans of such bands as The Smiths, Siouxie and the Banshees, R.E.M. and Sonic Youth an opportunity to see what some of these college and British bands looked like. At the same time it gave the artists another way to increase their fan bases.

The show now enlists guest VJs to host, which gives us a unique look at what artist likes what bands, but anyone who watched before Lewis Largent started hosting has to miss Dave Kendall. Kendall was the host who would wear a sweater from the Gap one week and look like the president of the Depeche Mode fan club the next, all the while spouting band names like Blur, Curve and Swervedriver with that hip British accent.

Shortening attention spans

The VJs that MTV have given us throughout the years have been just as much of a window into our culture as the videos themselves. Does anyone remember the names of the first five MTV VJs? This is good stuff to know for when they make a Trivial Pursuit for our generation. Nina Blackwood, Mark Goodman, Alan Hunter, J.J. Jackson and Martha ("I still get pimples") Quinn were the first VJs, and although the lineup remained static for five years, when "Downtown" Julie Brown graced us with her presence, not much else about the network has been about the status quo.

"MTV has contributed to a lessening of an attention span," Maclaughlin said. "Let's hurry up and get to the next shot, the next piece of eye candy."

The channel has nothing to prove in the righteousness department. Through various programs such as "Rock The Vote," "Rock Against Drugs," "Free Your Mind" and "Choose or Lose" (which played a major role in electing Clinton), the network has excelled in informing the 20- something generation on the various issues in a way that can hold its attention span. However, these programs have only added to the stereotype that (forgive me) "Generation X" only can digest small bits of information at a time.

"These views arise when the world is presented in two- second sound bytes and fragments of consciousness and intellect," Jhaily said. "MTV reflects a commercial aesthetic."

What will the future hold?

Throughout the next 10 to 15 years we can all probably expect that MTV will try to stay in the fast lane and continue to preach to the mainstream exactly what should be mainstream. But as Jhaily points out, we should all be aware of just what is behind the hipness that MTV masks itself with.

"MTV is just an image run by executives in three–piece suits. It's not some independent business in the giant industry," he said. "It's a part of a giant conglomerate no different than NBC, ABC or CBS. If you don't understand that, its PR has fooled you."

As Rob Sheffield put it in the recent 10th anniversary issue of Spin: "If MTV has a moral, it's that everything it touches, serious or trivial, turns to hype."

This hype has come to define our generation in the '80s and will continue to have a profound affect on the generations that are to follow.

Through Adam Curry and Pauly Shore, "Remote Control" and "YO! MTV Raps," Rockumenteries and Spring Break bashes, we've been bombarded with thoughts and images that could all amount to nothing if we don't do something with them. MTV, despite being highly commercialized, promotes many things that can make our society a better one to live in. From highly volatile subjects like fighting hatred to more benign topics like picking up a book, we have to practice a little of what MTV preaches, or we'll become no better than the stereotypical MTV viewer that Mike Judge makes fun of every night on "Beavis and Butthead."

Bosstones bring old school tunes to NoHo

THE MIGHTY MIGHTY BOSSTONES
Pearl Street
April 4

The Mighty Mighty Bosstones made a long awaited and triumphant return to the Valley Tuesday night when they brought ska–core, the devil and more to Pearl Street for a musical party extravaganza.

The ever–pleasing, fan–orientated Bosstones poured energy into every second of their set as they raged through musical samples from their increasing repertoire of material.

When lead singer Dicky Barrett bellowed out the challenge for the crowd to set the pace for the night, "Old school or new school?" the "old school" screams and hoots brought down the house. They compiled in extraordinary fashion as the horns (two saxophones and a trombone) piped up and the band played songs from throughout their musical history.

They blasted through "HOWWHYWUZ HOWWHYYAM," "Devil's Night Out," and the crowd favorite "Dr. D" ("It's a noise we love to make, and for years we have been making"). The sweaty, smiling crowd continued to stage dive like lemmings and bump n' jump about to the Bosstones workout.

The Bosstones, who regularly please crowds from Faneuil Hall to Copenhagen with their extensive touring, had the crowd moving all night as everybody heard their favorites. When they swung into a high decibel, action–packed "They Came to Boston," the whole crowd responded in animated fashion, putting an extra step in everyone's dance.

Even when they broke into their relatively slow ska version of Bob Marley's "Simmer Down," the crowd, steam rising off them up toward the lights, happily bounced about throwing water like a cooling rain.

Other highlights of the show included their hit single "Someday I Suppose," "He's Back" and the minor classic "Drunks and Children."

Much to the delight of the crowd, the Bosstones extended the show well past the midnight hour with two rousing encores in response to the crowd's chants of "Mighty! Mighty! Boss–tones!" A large number of fans gathered on stage to dance with the band during the drinking music of "Bartender's Song" at the end of the fun–filled night.

COURTESY JOHN FALLS

The Mighty Mighty Bosstones entertained a sold–out crowd at Pearl Street Nightclub Tuesday night.

As the tired and bruised fans found their way out into the chilling Northampton night with clothes drenched in sweat, all were pleased and smiling. And no matter how sore, if they heard the horns begin to blaze for another encore they would have stayed all night.

Bob Mould to strip down sound at Pearl St.

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Sometimes becoming a musical influence just sort of creeps up on you. That is the case with Bob Mould, who will perform solo acoustic at Pearl Street tonight.

Mould, taking time off from his current band Sugar, is no stranger to the world of playing solo. Widely known for the ear–wrenching volume he uses with his band, he often takes time out to tour (with no support from a record company) by himself — stripping away the layers of feedback and bringing his tunes back down to their core.

Mould started his musical career as the co–founder and frontman for the seminal punk/pop band Husker Du. One of the most influential bands of all time, Husker Du managed to take the dying spirit of punk and revive it with vigorous playing, washes of feedback and unabashed pop hooks. The band went on to record such classic albums as New Day Rising, Zen Arcade and Warehouse: Songs and Stories, spurning hordes of imitators and help laying the foundations for the alternative music revolution that was to come.

After a much publicized split, which was allegedly over drummer Grant Hart's drug problem, Mould decided to go solo. Workbook was his first post–Husker venture, and found him ditching all the noise for a more stark and introspective sound. The album won critical accolades across the boards and helped give Mould the recognition as a songwriter he deserved.

Obviously not wanting to be seen as going "soft," Mould plugged the amps back in for his second solo outing Black Sheets of Rain. A dark and harrowing affair, Black Sheets of Rain found Mould channeling much of the angst that permeated Workbook into a virtual storm of guitar fury.

Deciding that he wanted to return to more of a band setting, Mould jumped record labels and formed Sugar. Taking the best elements from the various phases of his career, Sugar managed to combine punk fury with pure pop bubblegum. The result was a new–found popularity for Mould as well as a new direction for his sound. Sugar's debut release, Copper Blue, was a pop gem, diving all over the stylistic map yet working as a unified whole.

The recent release of the band's follow–up album, File Under: Easy Listening, coincided with an extensive tour. Tonight's show is sure to highlight songs from all eras of Mould's career, as well as new songs that he may be working on.

Bob Mould will play Pearl Street tonight. Call 584–7771 for more information.

It's the World's Biggest Sedar.
And We Promise You Won't Have to Sit at the Kid's Table.

It's the Great North American Pesach Sedar! Of course, we won't all sit at one table – but it just might feel that way as we join together and celebrate our Festival of Freedom. Attending a Sedar enables all of us, and each of us personally, to experience anew the Exodus from Egypt.

That's why Chabad is sponsoring Sedorim on campuses across America, and distributing Free Passover Sedar-to-Go packages for Jewish students unable to attend.

Three-to-four people may share a Sedar-to Go, which comes complete with a handmade Shmurah matzah sample, a box of matzahs, a bottle of Kosher-for-Pesach grape juice and a Sedar Guide with full instructions for making your own Sedar.

So whether you're at a family Sedar or a Sedar on campus, or you order a Sedar-to-Go, don't miss your chance to join the celebration. We'll do whatever we can to help. Get involved...call today!

Play explores conflicts between women

By Yinan Estrada
Collegian Correspondent

On April 8, the New World Theater (NWT) will present Botánica, a play which explores the cultural conflict between three generations of Latino women.

Playwright Dolores Prida explores generational differences among an elderly Puerto Rican woman, her daughter and her granddaughter — an Ivy League university graduate.

Doña Geno, the oldest woman of the three, owns and runs a Botánica, which is an herb and folk medicine dispensary in East Harlem, N.Y. She and her daughter Carmen expect granddaughter Millie to take over the shop, but Millie has other plans for her future.

In the late '70s and early '80s there were very few plays about women at an international level. Botánica was written in 1986. Prida wanted to write about "cultural conflict among generations of women." The play also explores racial prejudice in higher education institutions in the United States.

In an effort to reach out to the Latino community in the spring of 1991, NWT presented the original production Encrucijada by playwright Manuel Méndez Ballester. Botánica once again promises to be a unique experience for the Latino community because it deals with issues migrating working class families go through in the United States. Yvonne Mendez of NWT says they are always glad to offer programming in the communities' native language.

Joshua Fontañez, coordinator of Latin American Theater Projects of NWT, agreed with Mendez.

"Botánica will launch a year-long theater project beginning in May that will unite professional Latino visiting artists, local and regional artists, as well as people from the human services fields," Fontañez said.

Repertorio Español, producer of Botánica, is considered by the National Endowment for the Arts to be one of the top resident theaters in the country.

Botánica will be presented at the Bowker Auditorium in Stockbridge Hall on April 8 at 8 p.m.

as Rodney Dangerfield, Carl Reiner, Lily Tomlin, Dick Van Dyke, Marilu Henner and (of all people) Bob Saget. Seemed to me that the smarmy host of the inappropriately titled "America's Funniest Home Videos" was a bad choice to serve as an authority on cutting edge comedy. I mean, Marilu's no great shakes either, but at least she was Kaufman's sitcom co-star — what's Bob's excuse?

Also on NBC, the new sitcom "Pride and Joy," about two married couples dealing simultaneously with the pressures of friendship and raising small children, shows some potential for good humor. Wisely staying away from the cutesy-poo terrain covered by "Full House" and other kidie-oriented comedies, this show instead appeals to the more mature sensibilities of 30ish audiences.

This show about parents almost never allows the much talked about little darlings to walk on camera — which is an undeniably unrealistic, but effective strategy to prevent wisecracking toddlers from taking over the show with their often tedious antics. The cast is quite watchable and their eccentricities help place this series a notch above the standard midseason replacement fare.

One exciting result of the recent network switching is the inexplicable return of CBS' "Burke's Law" to prime-time. Before it is inevitably cancelled for good, I'd like to say what a miracle has befallen us to have this "Love Boat" of the '90s back on the air, if only temporarily.

What other show can boast being jam-packed with such impressive stars as Pat Harrington, Howard Hesseman and Dom DeLuise? Too bad the movie industry couldn't accommodate these illustrious actors if "Burke" fails again — it's a shame that such talents continue to go unrecognized. But I suppose, if Philip Michael Thomas can come up in the world, there's always hope.

Tommy Boy lacks genuine wit

Saturday Night Live' stars prove they're unready for big screen

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

TOMMY BOY
Directed by Peter Segal with Chris Farley, David Spade
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

This year's Academy Awards ceremony celebrated the history of comedy. For those who watched, the quick montages of comedy films elicited a sentimental chuckle at how comedy used to be.

Movies like Tommy Boy, however, only reiterate the fact that the quality of recent comedy films has plummeted to a nadir that even Chris Farley can't obstruct.

Chris Farley starts with fellow "Saturday Night Live" not– ready–for–big–screen players David Spade and Dan Akyroyd. Farley plays the part of Tommy Boy — an overweight, uncoordinated, immature slacker who took seven years to graduate college.

Upon from graduation, Tommy Boy returns home to work with his father, Tom Callahan, at his Auto Supply Company. Tom Sr., played by Brian Dennehy, bears much resemblance to his son except he has some semblance of intelligence and business sense.

Richard (David Spade), one of Callahan Auto's account executives, is put in charge of showing Tommy Boy the ropes. Spade equips his character with his trademark whine and sarcastic, insulting wit. The only contribution Richard makes to the humor (and I use this term lightly) of this film are incessant fat jokes directed towards Tommy Boy.

Film creator and "SNL" patriarch Lorne Michaels brings back a favorite, Rob Lowe (Wayne's World), as Tommy Boy's stepbrother. Doc Hollywood's Julie Warner plays a Callahan employee, and Tommy Boy's (snicker) love interest.

As a comedian, Chris Farley's style has been compared to the likes of John Belushi, Abbott and Costello and the Three Stooges. The only similarity Farley shares with the late, great Belushi is the obvious "SNL" fame and high blood pressure.

Farley does not possess the intelligently dopey wit of Abbott or Costello. He may resemble Shemp, but Farley repeatedly colliding with glass doors is not the sort of slapstick the Stooges were fans of (at least not over and over again).

Even though fans hate to see Dan Akyroyd's career go downhill with mediocre movies (*Conehead*s, anyone?), he does have the funniest role in the film. Tommy Boy's antics may make you laugh, but the amusement is devoid of any intellect or wit. You know, the stuff real comedy is made of.

With movies like Dumb and Dumber and Billy Madison being the hit comedies of the past few months, we can only pray for Hollywood to throw us a few bones, like another Naked Gun sequel or something.

Brace yourselves, though. Al Franken's "SNL" character Stuart Smalley hits the big screen next week with his "Daily Affirmations" in Stuart Saves His Family. This, like Tommy Boy, is not a joke. D+

BYE BYE LOVE
Directed by Sam Weisman
with Paul Reiser, Matthew Modine, Randy Quaid
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

A recent trend in comedy movie–making has been the adaptation of television shows to the big screen, or TV actors going Hollywood. Nostalgic films like The Brady Bunch fare well at the theater, but sitcom–like flicks, such as Bye Bye Love, just don't cut it in a two–hour format.

"Mad About You" star Paul Reiser plays one of three divorced fathers (along with Matthew Modine and Randy Quaid) trying to cope with angry ex–spouses and limited child custody. Reiser injects his usual marriage–oriented humor into the film so much so it seems he is reading from his own humorous book, Couplehood.

Bye Bye Love is a light–hearted comedy, and plays like a modern day Parenthood. The downfall of this movie is the sitcom–style humor complete with one–liners that become tiresome very quickly. Massive amounts of advertisement (most scenes occur in McDonald's) also make this film feel like a television show.

Both Modine, who is the womanizing bachelor forever, and Quaid, the frustrated divorced man who has a terrible blind date, do excellent jobs in the film. Reiser, however, is awkward on the big screen and should stick to television.

All television–style humor aside, Bye Bye Love does have some hilarious scenes with Quaid and a radio talk show host played with obnoxious charm by Rob Reiner. Reiser's one– liners often fall flat, however, and the film itself is very predictable. If all of the useless scenes were cut, this could be a humorous half–hour television show.

Bye bye box office for Bye Bye Love. C+

Group restores home for needy

By Scott Martin
Collegian Correspondent

The Five College community is planning to come together and build a more friendly environment for the homeless this weekend.

The Five College Habitat for Humanity will hold "Gimme Shelter, '95 Springfest Challenge" on Saturday at 76 Old Town Road in Amherst. The event will run from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Volunteers will be restoring a house on Old Town Road to be occupied by a low-income family, said David Amsbary, a University of Massachusetts senior psychology major.

"We want to get as many people as possible [to volunteer] and get the house done in one day," he said.

The house being refurbished is property of the University, said William Rose, associate vice chancellor for campus services.

UMass developed an agreement with the Habitat for Humanity to restore the vacant property into a home for a low–income member of the university staff, Rose said.

"It's a win–win situation," Rose said. "The bottom line is we're improving a building and allowing a low–income family to occupy it."

Volunteers are needed for painting the house, landscaping the yard and replacing doors, said Amsbary. Materials have been donated by Home Depot, the Hadley Garden Center and Northampton Paint Center.

It's not all work and no play, however, at the Springfest Challenge, Amsbary said.

"When people come, we want something for everyone to do — we want to create a good time," Amsbary said.

An information court will be sponsored by community service organizations and the local band Hullabaloo will play in the afternoon, said Mary Kruger, senior environmental science major.

Vendors such as People's Market and Greenough Snack Bar will be at the site, she said.

Elisabeth Allen, senior BDIC major at UMass, feels that housing is a bigger problem in the Pioneer Valley than many people think.

"The homeless shelters in the area speak to the fact that a problem exists," Allen said.

A volleyball tournament and a mountain bike raffle will be used on Saturday to raise funds for the Five College chapter of the Habitat for Humanity group. Proceeds will be used to pay for building materials and for future community projects.

"We'll build houses in the future from the ground up," Amsbary said.

This event is the first community housing project for the Five College chapter. The chapter began in April 1993 and is a member of Habitat for Humanity International.

"We're doing what the Habitat is all about — eliminating substandard housing," Amsbury said. "This movement gets things done. We pick up a hammer and fix things."

An information booth has been set up at the campus center concourse throughout the week. People can volunteer to help, register for the volleyball tournament or buy a raffle ticket for the mountain bike at the booth.

Repairs in Student Union to save energy

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Correspondent

Loud banging and periods without heat in the Student Union may be a nuisance, but they are a sign that repairs are underway on the building's heating system.

For the next three months, elements in the steam traps will be replaced, ultimately conserving steam, said Ray Mikolajczyk, a University of Massachusetts plumber.

"The heat will have to be turned off to do the repairs," said Mark Schwinger, the director of operations at the Physical Plant.

"If it's cold out, though, we will turn the heat on for an hour to warm up the Student Union, then turn it off to do the repairs, and so on."

There will be banging sounds as well, but special requests for maintenance to stop working in certain areas for a short period of time will be accommodated, Schwinger said.

He said they have done this before in other buildings and it has been a very successful operation.

The steam traps are what separate the unused steam from the waste water afterward. The trap holds the waste water and then dumps it into underground pipes for disposal, said Pat Daly, acting director of the UMass Physical Plant.

If the steam traps stick shut or open, the result is a loss of heat and wasted energy, Daly said.

It is not going to be an expansive job — it is just routine maintenance, Daly said.

"We perform ongoing repairs all year long," he said. "It's not unusual."

Every building is scheduled for steam trap maintenance once every two or three years.

"It happens to be the Student Union's turn this year," Schwinger said. "We have two to three people working on it, and the job will last approximately three months."

Sayer compared $70,000 to two teachers' salaries.

"A $70,000 cut at this point in the game is quite significant," Sayer said. "I'm not sure how we would make that up at this point in time."

Not the first time

Cuts in education reform bills seem to be a recurring nightmare for teachers across the state, Wollmer said.

According to Wollmer, Massachusetts passed education reform bills twice before, once in 1985 and again in 1987. Both failed due to lack of funding.

"There have been good reform efforts that have lasted a couple of years and then fizzled out," Story said. "But this is not fizzling out."

According to Story, the state's K–12 school system is still receiving millions of dollars more than they were four years ago. She said not to get too gloomy.

The State House hopes to vote on the proposal by April 13, said Kathy Fallon, aide to Story.

Wetteland traded to Yanks

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — The New York Yankees acquired one of the top relief pitchers in the major leagues today, getting John Wetteland from the cash-poor Montreal Expos for a minor league prospect, a player to be named later and money.

The Expos were set to announce another trade this afternoon. Wetteland, along with starting pitcher Ken Hill and outfielder Marquis Grissom, have been offered around the majors by general manager Kevin Malone, who wants to trade one or both of them before the midnight Friday deadline for offering arbitration.

"This is not a fire sale. A fire sale is when you're giving guys away," Malone said.

Expos management has said it will lose $20 million because of the strike and is trying to pare its payroll to about $12 million. Wetteland had 25 saves in 52 appearances for the Expos in 1994 and is considered among the top closers in either league.

In return, the Expos got Fernando Seguignol, a 20-year-old outfielder who averaged .262 in two seasons in Class A ball. The Expos chose Seguignol over third baseman Russell Davis, who played at Class AAA Columbus last season.

"All the people I've talked to tell me (Seguignol) is one of our top young prospects and should become a fine major leaguer," Yankees general manager Gene Michael said.

Malone said the cash from the trade, combined with the $2.225 million from Wetteland's 1994 salary, would enable the team to sign some free agents later this week.

Wetteland, 4-6 with a 2.83 ERA last year, fills the Yankees' need for a right-handed bullpen closer. The job was shared by Bob Wickman and Xavier Hernandez last season. Steve Howe is the left-handed closer.

"It'll definitely enhance our chances to win the championship. Wetteland has an above-average fastball and an above-average breaking pitch. He doesn't rely on one pitch to get people out." Yankees manager Buck Showalter said.

Wetteland, 27, had 43 saves in 1993 and 37 in 1992 for Montreal. He began his career in the Los Angeles Dodgers' organization as a starter.

Michael said the Yankees would offer Wetteland arbitration Friday. The acquisition of a possible addition $5 million of salary to the team payroll was approved by owner George Steinbrenner. Grissom, Hill and Wetteland were the club's three topwage-earners last season, and all were players eligible for salary arbitration.

Hill, a right-hander who was 16-5, made $2.55 million last season. Grissom, the center fielder, made $3.56 million.

Free agent right fielder Larry Walker, who made $4.025 million, is expected to sign with another team, possibly the Colorado Rockies.

the broad- shouldered forward has a chance to carry that weight successfully on his back.

The NHL has always hoped to expand racially, but for various reasons it hasn't happened. The NHL hopes expand into areas that aren't traditionally hockey hotbeds, and becoming more diverse would help with new fan bases.

• The loss of Jeremy Roenick is absolutely devastating to the Blackhawks. The franchise center who tore his anterior cruciate ligament after a leg check by Derian Hatcher will miss all of this season and perhaps longer.

With Roenick, the Blackhawks had emerged into a Stanley Cup contender. The had a solid and talented defense, a marquee goaltender in Ed Belfour, and a superstar. The combination put a scare in the conference-leading Red Wings.

The loss of that superstar, however, leaves Chicago reeling. Watch for the Blackhawks to try to acquire another forward (Steve Thomas?) at the trade deadline in hopes of repairing their offense.

• Experts throughout the league are trying to figure out what's wrong in Toronto. Going into the season, the Leafs looked to be contenders again. Instead Toronto is lingering in fourth place in the Central.

While Mats Sundin (18 goals, 16 assists, 34 points) is the Leafs' leading scorer, the player they traded to get him may have been too big a loss. Wendall Clark had been the heart of the Maple Leafs, and his intangibles and toughness are clearly missing from the Leafs. It's no coincidence either that this is the year that the Nordiques are finally realizing their potential.

• After years of weak promotion, ESPN has finally gotten the lock on how to market NHL telecasts. The sarcastic, even goofy commercials that buffoon some of the league's top players are not only funny, but the head shots make the players more personal. A rarity in the helmeted NHL.

Its actual game coverage has been superb as well. Its audience seems to prove that the NHL survived the lockout without losing that many viewers.

On the other hand ... Remember everything you were worried FOX might do when you heard it would broadcast the NFL. Well, it's happening in the NHL broadcasts. While having a network doing the games is great for the sport, it might be nice if hockey was taken a little more seriously.

• With the season less than 15 games away from over, it's time to start examining who might carry away the hardware from this shortened NHL campaign.

Most Valuable Player: Eric Lindros, Philadelphia. The hype surrounding him, and a lack of supporting cast has submerged Lindros early in his career. The maturing Lindros has become a leader, and now has players around him that he can lead. He has led the Flyers to a surprising first place in the Atlantic Division, and will be key for the first legitimate playoff run in the City of Brotherly Love in a while. Runner-up: Jaromir Jagr.

Calder Trophy, Rookie of the Year: Jim Carey, Washington. Since his debut, the Capitals have been incredible. His 1.73 goals against average is the league's best. Despite only appearing in 19 games, the rookie deserves the award. Runner-up: Peter Forsberg.

Vezina Trophy (NHL's top goalie): Carey. Traditionally this award goes to the league's most valuable goalie. Carey (13-2-2) has unquestionably the force behind Washington's resurgence. Runner-up: Dominik Hasek.

Norris Trophy: Raymond Bourque, Boston. The Boston Captain is logging lots of minutes and playing well offensively and has been solid defensively. Sound familiar. Runner-up: Chris Chelios.

• There is absolutely no truth to the rumor that if Barry Melrose gets fired as coach of the Los Angeles Kings he can return to his previous job as keyboard player for Winger.

Massachusetts lacrosse falls short in heartbreaker at Duke

By Matt Vautour
Collegian staff

Sometimes you lose, sometimes you just run out of time.

The University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's bid for an upset of No. 8 Duke fell just short as the Blue Devils held off the Minutemen to squeak out a 9–8 victory in Durham, N.C., yesterday.

With 35 seconds left and Duke a man down, Massachusetts made one last furious rally as a Brendan Glass shot went off the cross bar, and Buddy Hoffman's shot went wide, allowing the home team to escape with the victory.

"The clock just ran out on us, but we had plenty of opportunities at the end," said Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella.

The fans at Duke were treated to a goaltending clinic as both Duke's Joe Kimser (19 saves) and UMass' Tom LoPresti (18 saves) were brilliant throughout the contest, as neither team could break into double digits.

"He was just outstanding," Cannella said. "I'm learning what to expect from him, he's very consistent."

UMass freshman John Kasselakis replaced LoPresti briefly when the senior netminder limped off. Kasselakis gave up one goal before LoPresti returned to the lineup.

Offensively, Glass led the Minutemen, scoring his second straight hat trick, to help key a second half UMass comeback. Matt Ogelsby had three goals as well for the Blue Devils.

Cannella was plessed with his team's overall performance.

"I'm happy with the team. They played real hard as usual," Cannella said. "That's what our coaching staff wants: playing hard with a lot of heart. I think we surprised Duke. They are well coached and very physical."

As he has in each of the first three games, the first-year coach singled out the play of his defense.

"Our defense was outstanding against a good offensive team," he said. "Right now the defense is the backbone of this team."

Playing catch–up

The Minutemen had to play catch–up for most of the game. Casey Costello got the visitors on the board first, with his second goal of the season, but the Blue Devils responded, scoring two goals to take a 2–1 lead after the first quarter.

"Duke finished their opportunities early and we couldn't," Cannella said.

Duke continued on that pace, early in the second period extending the lead to 5–2 late in the first half. The Blue Devil's offense was adept at keeping possession while UMass' offense was repeatedly frustrated by Kimser.

With less than a minute left before intermission Massachusetts called timeout, as Cannella hoped to rally his troops.

It paid off as Glass collected his first goal of the afternoon with nine seconds left to cut the Duke lead to 5–3.

The momenium carried over into the second half for UMass. After killing off a two man down situation, the offense came to life.

Glass scored his second goal less than two minutes in with one of his trademark over–the–shoulder shots to beat Kimser. Junior Eric Triolo tied the game shortly after with an unassisted strike of his own.

After Duke jumped back ahead, UMass went into a lapse brought on by an injury to LoPresti that sidelined him briefly. By the time the Minutemen had gotten back on track the Blue Devils led by three goals again at 8–5.

The visitors battled back again. Valente scored his fifth of the year as he was being knocked backwards.

Glass completed the hat trick on a blast that beat Kimser, and it was Triolo once again who provided the equalizer as he tied the game at less than three minutes into the final period.

COLLEGIAN FILE

Senior forward Mike Valente had a goal and two assists despite being the target of fierce marking by Duke.

COLLEGIAN FILE

Junior midfielder Eric Triolo played a scored the game tying goal for the Minutemen early in the fourth quarter.

The Minutemen attacked feverishly trying to gain the lead, but it backfired as Scott Harrison picked off a pass and broke free unmolested for a breakaway goal that proved to be the game–winner.

UMass returns to action April 12 at New Hampshire.

Notebook: The win was Duke's first ever in three tries against the Minutemen ... Glass' hat trick was the sixth of his career. The sophomore attackman has 10 goals already this season and is on pace to eclipse his 33 goals of a year ago ...

Valente's four assists give him 75 on his career and moves him into eighth place on the UMass career list in the category ...

Junior Eric Bailey had no points in the contest snapping his 16 game scoring streak that dated back to last year's season opener against Virginia ... It's true. Duke freshman midfielder Ben Quayle is the son of the former vice president.

Collegian staff members Brian Perillo and Anthony Guido contributed to this article.

Grier has chance to be a superstar and NHL legend

Matt Vautour on the NHL

With the NCAA hockey championships finished, many NHL teams have begun to look into the college ranks at players that they've drafted in hopes of finding someone that can contribute down the stretch.

One player that could make that immediate impact is Boston University's Mike Grier. Since the Terriers captured the crown (and even before) Brett Hull has been excited about the possibility of having the talented Grier as a teammate.

Only a sophomore, Grier emerged as the one of the most dominant players in Hockey East. After a mediocre freshman season, in which he scored seven goals and added seven assists for 14 points, Grier finished his second season with 29 goals and 26 assists for 55 points in 37 games to help lead Boston University to the National Championship.

The NHL covets size, and the Hollisten native has plenty of it. In addition to his soft hands and scoring skills, Grier has a 6–foot, 242–pound frame that has made opponents think twice before going into the corners.

Power forwards have become valuable commodities. The prospect of the "next Neely or Adam Graves" is enough to make any GM's mouth water.

St. Louis is anxiously awaiting Grier's decision. The Blues, who are currently in second place in the Central Division, could use the added scoring and toughness come playoff time.

Regardless of whether Grier comes out now or later, the BU star likely has a promising NHL career ahead of him. But more importantly, Grier could become legendary for another reason ...

Mike Grier is Black. Because of a variety of circumstances, the NHL is the last of the major professional sports to be racially integrated. In the past, the few African– Americans who played have made a minimal impact on the sport. Grier has a chance to change all that.

With the exception of Grant Fuhr, who's impressive goaltending numbers were overshadowed by his more high profile teammates (Gretzky, Kurri, Messier etc.), no minority hockey player has entered the NHL spotlight.

Grier has a chance to begin to open doors, and

Softball heads to Hartford game with Hawks

■ First double-header today after first two were cancelled due to rain

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

It has happened twice already this season to the Massachusetts softball team. Two double headers have been scheduled at Totman Field over the past week, and both have been washed up, as the two sets of games were postponed because of rain.

But as Mother Nature has staked her claim in the Minutewomen's (14–11, 4–0 in Atlantic 10) scheduled home– openers, Coach Elaine Sortino understands the situation. She knows her team plays in New England. She knows the weather in the region is unpredictable.

"I'm getting used to it," Sortino said.

"I don't think anybody can imagine playing with the 'uncontrollables' with softball and baseball, especially in this region," she said.

"It's difficult to try to schedule yourself on when you are going to peak before heading into the postseason. You lose games, you lose wins. What are you going to do? We'll just try to stay focused."

Their immediate focus is today's double header with Hartford in West Hartford, Conn. The Hawks will enter with an impressive 12–1–1 record.

However, Hartford coach Trish Wodatch knows her team has not faced a team of Massachusetts caliber just yet.

"We're very pleased with the way [we have] played. Our 12–1–1 record is great, but we have yet to see a team like UMass. But we're excited and ready to play," Wodatch said.

The Hawks, who are down in the all–time series against Massachusetts 17–1, fell twice to the Minutewomen last season.

Both results were 5–0 shutout losses, with Massachusetts pitchers Kelly Daut and Dani Ortega picking up the victories.

Wodatch believes her Hawks are stronger than in recent years. Like Massachusetts, Hartford is a year older and more experienced.

"We've had a good group of games. We're hitting and pitching well, we've been pulling together as a team. To beat UMass, we'll have to step it up," Wodatch said.

One reason that the Hawks have to be concerned is because of the play of late from third baseman Sam Cardenas.

"Sam is tearing it up. The thing I like about Sam is her great eye at the plate. If I could take anyone in the country to leadoff, I'd take Sam.

"She leads the team in RBIs (20), and she is our leadoff hitter," Sortino said.

"She is especially reliable. She can hit the outside pitch, and she is capable of pulling an inside pitch over the fence."

With the recent cancellations, the Minutewomen have played only two double headers over the last two weeks. Still, Massachusetts, who swept both St. Joseph's and Temple last weekend, will be playing on four days' rest.

COLLEGIAN FILE

The University of Massachusetts softball team hopes that the weather will allow them to get the game in against Hartford today.

Also, the early season schedules of the two teams are rather different. Massachusetts played against opponents like Cal State Fullerton, Arizona State, Virginia and other national powers. Hartford's opponents? Butler, West Chester, LeMoyne, Tufts and Williams are among the Hawks' foes.

Sortino feels the layoff period, coupled with the Minutewomen's strong schedule, can only help them.

"We've played a much tougher schedule [than Hartford], and I'm glad we're going to be coming off a four–day rest," Sortino said.

She is confident about this afternoon's double header against Hartford. That is, barring the "uncontrollables."

"We should be better than Hartford in pitching and batting. But if it's cold, it's not going to matter," Sortino said.

Discrimination charges filed against University

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

A Latin American worker for the janitorial services has charged his supervisor and the University of Massachusetts with being treated unfairly in the work place.

Armando Hernandez, 44, of Amherst, filed charges Jan. 23 with the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination (MCAD). Hernandez's claim cited UMass and Hernandez's supervisor, Peter D. Keegan, with unlawful discrimination against him and his national origin, according to Alan Cassella, a compliance officer at MCAD.

MCAD is a state civil rights law enforcement agency which conducts investigations on cases of alleged discrimination.

Hernandez, a seven–year worker with the University, is employed with the janitorial services of the Campus Center.

Keegan has been a UMass employee for 19 years, 17 of those years as a supervisor.

Hernandez is claiming Keegan has treated him and other Latinos unfairly in the work place.

Citing a recent example, Hernandez said he hurt his back earlier this semester and Keegan drove him to University Health Services. Hernandez said Keegan never filled out an accident report.

"Without the report, it looks like I skipped out on work," Hernandez said. "Plus, I got paid late [because of the incident]."

Hernandez said he is not being treated equally because he is not given keys to the supply closet. He said that on Saturdays, he works with only one other worker who has keys to the equipment closet, if that person does not come into work, Hernandez said he cannot do his job.

"I have seen [Keegan] sign out keys to people," Hernandez said. "I must be the only maintenance man on campus without any keys."

Hernandez also said he does not get overtime hours and is told what days he can have off.

Keegan said he declined comment until after the hearings with MCAD.

Hernandez will return to MCAD next week with evidence to support his claims.

Cassella said once they get the information, they will decide if they need more evidence, or if they can make a decision on the case.

If the commissioner finds probable cause, that does not mean they find the University or Keegan guilty of any charges, Cassella said. From there, they would try to settle the case or bring it to a public hearing.

Hernandez is paying for a lawyer to represent him, but Cassella said MCAD does not require counsel.

Hernandez said he brought Keegan to court earlier this semester clsiming Keegan had approached Hernandez in a "threatening" manner. Keegan was not charged.

William Harris, director of the Campus Center, declined any comment.

Project Pulse surveys needs for child care

By Maureen Rozanski
Collegian Staff

Project Pulse and the Family Issues Committee will conduct a campus–wide telephone survey in May aimed at learning the child care needs of all University of Massachusetts families with children from infancy to nineteen years of age.

This survey is the "first step" — of a long process — in identifying the needs of employees and students with children, said facilitator of the Family Issues Committee, Cecilia Rio.

She said, after identifying their needs, the committee will work towards "implementing policies and practices that will help employees and students integrate work, family and academic life."

The 78 slots for University Child Care shows a "glaring need" for the committee to recognize and respond to the needs of families, said Rio. However, this survey must be done to give the administration an idea of how many students — undergraduate and graduate — and employees have children.

Associate Chancellor Susan Pearson said the survey will provide info on who has children, so that Project Pulse can do a comprehensive survey.

Theater represents life & community for UMass student

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Suzanne LeGrande had a group of 25 adults jumping up and down and making faces at one another in an April 5 workshop on theater and the making of political community.

LeGrande is a doctoral candidate in communications at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and spoke as part of the Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual Studies Brown Bag Series. The series is sponsored by the UMass Program for GLB Concerns.

While some participants admitted to embarrassment as they followed LeGrande's guidelines — for instance, playing a game of "pass the clap" — others expressed a sense of enjoyment at being able to "be in their bodies."

Power of theater

The exercises had a two–fold purpose, said LeGrande. First, they were intended to give people at the workshop an idea of the power of theater, and, second, they served as a jumping–off place for a discussion on the making of political community.

Theater has a unique power that allows people to experience their visions of the world, said LeGrande. While abstract discussion may have some value, for LeGrande, it is only through action that she finds inspiration. Instead of imagining "where we want to go," people involved in theater have to opportunity to experience that world, she said.

LeGrande used the "psss the clap" game to demonstrate the nature of community. Participants stood in a circle and pretended they were passing a clap around and around. Without the rest of the people in the circle, no one individual could have accomplished anything and the game could never have occurred, she said.

Achieving vision involves risk

A similar situation exists in the GLB community and many other communities, LeGrande said. As a lesbian, she admitted that working toward her vision of love is often difficult. She said that sometimes she feels like she is standing at the top of a high cliff looking down at a beautiful lake. Working toward her vision of love involves a level of risk that is comparable to jumping off that cliff and into the lake, she said.

However, LeGrande noted, the knowledge that others have already taken the risk and "jumped" inspires her and makes her feel more confident. The presence of others who share her vision and are willing to work toward it with her is another form of motivation, she said.

For LeGrande, true political community involves a sense of "shared vision" that people hold in common and allows them to see the world not for what it is but for what it should be.

Instead of dwelling on "images of horror," LeGrande finds inspiration in people whose actions work toward a better world.

"These are the people who take the risk to sing and dance in the face of oppression," LeGrande said.

LeGrande used the metaphor of people in a burning room staring at the emergency exit but never leaving. It is when someone decides to escape and take others with them that political change takes place and vision becomes reality, she said.

In the making of political community, LeGrande said, being concerned about your own welfare is not enough. To have a real community, people must make room for others.

"You have to admit that what you want to do has to do with other people. You can't possibly leave others alone," she said.

Applications on the rise, will increase standards

Marc Fournier, a representative from the office of Waste Management, spoke at yesterday's meeting of the Faculty Senate; however, the issue took a back seat to that of admissions standards at the University.

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

Chancellor David K. Scott is projecting an increase of freshman applications in the future that may allow the University of Massachusetts to become more selective.

Scott gave a presentation on the future of the admission pool at yesterday's faculty senate meeting, in between pleas from members of Waste Management and the Family Issues Committee for funding and acknowledgement.

However, the audience seemed more attentive to Scott's data and information than the discussions on recycling and accessible childcare.

The senate moved to abbreviate the childcare presentation, which led Prasad Venugopal, president of the Graduate Student Senate (GSS) to accuse them of "outright censorship."

Prior to the GSS's walk–out, Scott spoke about admission.

Scott said that an "echo of the [baby]boom" in higher education is due to the baby boomers' children coming–of the college age. According to Scott, this increase will insure that the University upholds relatively high standards.

While the University presently requires a minimum of 994 on Scholastic Apitude Tests (SAT), Scott has set a five–year goal for a minimal score of 1050, he said.

And with his foreseen five percent increase of retention over those five years, he said he will work to assure students who hold "the potential, but don't have the background" more student support.

Currently, 10,000 of the approximate 45,000 public high school graduates in Massachusetts apply to the University, according to documents distributed by Scott at the meeting. The data for the documents were compiled by the Office of Academic Planning and Assessment.

Scott used 1989 as a reference point to compare his standing objectives in relation to the approaches used by the former administration in 1989 — a year similar to 1995, in that funding was scarce.

At that time, the administration reduced faculty and staff by 755, and freshman applications were on the decline, Scott said.

They could have chosen to propose further cuts to programs and faculty, but instead the University accepted a larger number of incoming freshman from a smaller application pool.

According to Scott, people could argue that the University should have downsized further instead of lowering the academic standards, but he said that he does not see this as a dilemma that he will be forced to face.

As of now, the freshman applications for 1995 are up six percent, at approximately 17,500, said Jo–Anne Vanin, dean of students.

Scott said that with the numbers of in–state applications on the upswing since 1993 and indication that this trend will continue, the University will be able to admit students from a larger pool of applicants and ultimately, be more selective.

Aristide calms Haitian election fears

By Lisa M. Hamm
Associated Press

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti — Amid deepening concern over upcoming elections, President Jean-Bertrand Aristide called a special meeting yesterday so political parties could air concerns to Haiti's Electoral Council.

"There are problems and there will be problems," Aristide told the gathering at the National Palace. "I welcome you on the road to the solution to the problems."

The U.N. peacekeeping force here to monitor June 4 legislative elections pledged to provide security and help Haiti conduct fair elections.

American officials consider those elections a key test of Haiti's fledgling democracy.

However, the assassination last week of opposition leader Mireille Durocher Bertin has made some politicians wary about participating. With an April 17 deadline approaching, voter registration also is low, running at only about 25 percent of the electorate in Haiti's most populous states.

The head of the U.N. mission, the commander of the peacekeeping force and the leader of the 900-member U.N. police force attended the five-hour meeting Thursday. Leaders of more than 20 political parties joined them.

Opposition parties complain that the Electoral Council is pro-Aristide and that voters cannot find registration places. Many politicians have not declared their candidacies, required by April 10.

"One after the other, the political parties are expressing their worries about the electoral process," said Rene Theodore, a former communist party leader who heads the Movement to Reconstruct the Nation.

Anselm Remy, president of the Electoral Board, acknowledged "certain complaints are valid."

"We have done what we could to remedy that," Remy said. The Electoral Council promised to address the parties' concerns within two days.

The United States is providing most of a $13.5 million election budget. U.N. leaders pledged to provide security and help Haiti conduct free and fair elections.

"The great lesson of South Africa is that dialogue permits us to solve difficult problems," said the leader of the U.N. police force, Superintendent Neil Poullot of Canada. "We are going to be at your side in the coming months."

Aristide, Haiti's first democratically elected leader, was ousted in a September 1991 coup after seven months in office. He was restored to power in October after American troops arrived and oversaw the resignations of Haiti's military leaders.

Owens cancels UMass visit due to family crisis

Due to a family crisis, U.S. Congressman Major Owens (D-N.Y.) will not be able to speak at the University of Massachusetts this Sunday. Owens was being brought to campus by Hillel to speak on "Building a Coalition of the Caring Majority: Blacks & Jews as the Conscience of the New World Order."

According to Hillel President Nurit Ben-Harav, Hillel will try to reschedule the event after it has been resolved.

Owens is now in his seventh term in the House of Representatives. He was the chair of the Subcommittee on Select Education and Civil Rights, as well as being a senior member of the Economic and Employment Opportunities Committee (formerly Education and Labor.)

He has sponsored legislation on issues such as child abuse and domestic violence prevention, child adoption and family issues, and disability issues, including the "Americans with Disabilities Act" which bars discrimination against individuals with disabilities in employment and other areas of life.

UM minority students urged to travel abroad

By Jane Oh
Collegian Correspondent

In an effort to promote multiculturalism on campus, students of color are being urged to partake in the study abroad program.

On Wednesday night at the New Africa House, the International Programs Office (IPO), with the help of Sean Warner, peer counseling coordinator of Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and Other Minority Students (CCEMBS) sponsored a forum in an effort to encourage minorities to study overseas.

Carol Lebold, a study abroad coordinator at IPO, said, "many things inhibit students from studying abroad, which is only exacerbated for minorities; fear of leaving the United States, disapproval by friends and family and fear of racism often prevent students of color from participating in such programs." Furthermore, students often worry about the costs.

"Many things inhibit students from studying abroad, which is only exacerbated for minorities."

However, according to JoAnn Bernhard, an advisor in the study abroad program, the cost of studying overseas is usually equivalent to the cost of attending UMass. Furthermore, financial aid can often be applied to such programs while also fulfilling foreign language requirements and earning credits.

In addition to academic reasons, students often participate in study abroad programs for personal reasons. Para Dibinga, a French and economics major, decided to study in France because he was "sick of being the only Black person in class." He encouraged students to study overseas because "they may never have the chance again and eventually they'll regret it."

Georgette James, a junior accounting major, said she was "a stronger person" after studying in the Netherlands. "My family and friends discouraged me from going," she said. "They said I would be the only Black person there — and I was — but overall, I had a great experience. Furthermore, James said she learned more about herself. "I learned who I really was."

Study abroad programs are often a student's first and last opportunity to learn about life in other parts of the world. Often, students return with a different perspective, as well as appreciation for foreign cultures. According to John Higginson, a professor in the history department, "It is absolutely necessary for Americans to have continental appreciation for what lies beyond the United States."

Joye Bowman, a professor in the history department, who studied in Nigeria and Carlene Edie, of the political science department who studied in Egypt, also spoke of their experiences studying abroad.

Bobbitt, one other man accuse each other of throwing punches

By Jeff Donn
Associated Press

WEST SPRINGFIELD — A nightclub patron said he was punched yesterday by John Wayne Bobbitt, who gained celebrity when his wife cut off his penis. Bobbitt says the man punched him. Pedro Maldonado, of Holyoke, lodged a complaint of assault and battery later in the day against Bobbitt, who is in western Massachusetts performing as an emcee for a female exotic dancer.

"I didn't punch him at all," said Bobbitt, the day after the fight. "He was thrown out of the club for assaulting me." Bobbitt said he bought drinks for Maldonado's party at Maldonado's insistence.

Bobbitt said Maldonado threw a drink at him and started throwing punches. Bobbitt said he pushed him away. Under state law, the private criminal complaint, which was filed in Springfield District Court, must be reviewed by a clerk magistrate. The clerk magistrate may later set a hearing on the accusation and then file formal charges, if warranted.

Town police working on a security detail at the Night Lights nightclub in West Springfield were called outside to handle a disturbance as patrons left at closing time, around 1:45 a.m. Bobbitt, who is performing through Saturday at the Magic Lantern club in Monson, had been a customer at the bar.

Sgt. Thomas Wilkinson, one of the officers, said he found an angry Maldonado being restrained by friends. He accused Bobbitt of punching him in the face "for no reason" on the sidewalk outside the nightclub, the officer said.

She said the importance of "available and affordable child care is critical" to students and employees with children to stay in school and work. The survey, she said, will help "figure out what the most pressing needs are."

The committee consists of representatives from the University Child Care Office, Graduate Employee Organization, Family Housing, Foreign Student Office, Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center, Single Parent Association, Graduate Student Senate, UAW Local 2322, Student Affairs Office and Chancellor's Office.

As many families as possible are needed to conduct the May survey, Pearson said roughly 10,000 registration forms were distributed — attached to pay checks, direct mailing or in off campus drop-off locations. She said several hundred have already been returned.

The forms are in the GEO Office in the Student Union, the Commuter Service and Housing Resource Center, Everywoman's Center and University Health Services.

Registration forms should be completed and mailed as soon as possible.

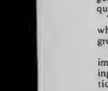
Opinion/Editorial

Mather needs new location

Mather Career Center is an essential resource for job hunters, internship seekers and many other students here at the University. It houses an impressive and helpful library and offers a resume referral service as well as numerous career workshops. The center employs many friendly and helpful students and professionals to answer questions, set up interviews and generally get the ball rolling in the job or internship quest.

That said, let's talk about the reasons why the place should be burned to the ground as soon as possible.



Caleb Cochran

One would think that three of the most important factors to consider when building a campus career center would be "location, location and location." The career center is one of the most important buildings at the University. Why, then, is it hidden deep in the woods across the street from Orchard Hill? One of the reasons I never visited the career center before I owned a car was because I feared that if I ever missed the bus back to campus, I would be stranded there and eventually starve to death. The location of the place is absolutely ridiculous. Remote real estate like this should be reserved for the parking office or police headquarters. Mather is much too important to be stuck out in the woods.

I have been composing a resume recently, and periodically I need to go to the career center to work on it. However, I only have time to hike out there on Friday. You see, on the other days of the week, I have classes, and trying to "run over" to the career center from campus is like trying to "run in" to Whitmore during add-drop period — it can't be done. I'm certain that many other students are in the same boat — they need to use the career center, but simply don't have time during the day to get out there. If the center were located somewhere closer to the academic center of campus, students would be able to make quick trips in and out during the week without having to set aside an hour just to go print out a resume.

It's one thing to have the career center out in the middle of nowhere, but to have it out in the middle of nowhere and still not be able to provide adequate parking is absurd. I'm always relieved when I exit the center and see that my car has not been towed. I'm pretty sure that I'm always parked illegally at Mather, what with the section of the lot reserved for the adjacent fraternity and the spots which are technically part of the "red" lot. (I have a purple "D" lot sticker, but I never see any purple lot anywhere near Mather.) I guess you're supposed to park in the "E" lot section of the dirt lands up there, but who knows where this begins or ends either?

Recently one of my friends who works at Mather got a parking ticket because he accidentally parked in some illegal lot instead of the "E" lot, although the only thing that separates the two lots is a patch of dirt. When even the employees don't know where to park, it's time to re- examine your parking situation. As for me, I'll just continue to park right next to the building and take my chances.

If Mather plans to stay at its present location, someone should get up there with a bulldozer and start constructing a decent parking lot. If the career center has to be stuck in the middle of Amherst State Forest, the least the University can do is build them a new parking lot.

The whole parking problem could be avoided if the career center were moved closer to the center of campus. I can't imagine that finding a more central location for Mather could be all that difficult. Anything within a mile radius of the W.E.B. Du Bois library would be better than the current location. It seems kind of weird to me that the University has no problem plopping a gargantuan architectural atrocity like the Fine Arts Center in the middle of campus but can't find a couple of floors of office space for the career center. I guess the ultimate fate of the University's students just isn't that high on the ol' priority list. A separate building, such as the one that currently exists, would be nice, but I'm sure the center could scale down just a tad and work perfectly well out of one of the currently existing buildings on campus.

A better location would translate into more traffic at the career center, which would translate into more jobs for graduates, which would ultimately translate into more positive publicity for the University. The students, the University and the career center itself would all benefit from a move to the center of campus. What's the holdup?

Don't tinker with genetics

Every day, scientists are making new breakthroughs in the field of genetic engineering. These breakthroughs continue to come at an alarming pace. It's difficult to read a paper or watch a news broadcast without coming across the phrase, "Scientists have found a new gene linked with..."

Mark McGrath

A project now underway called The Human Genome Project is currently mapping out the human genome, or the genetic blueprints that make up a person. Eventually, given a DNA sample, scientists will be able to tell everything about a person, from their physical characteristics to their probable cause of death.

This may lead you to believe that these new achievements come in the name of progress, but they will actually send the world into chaos. What right now may look like advancement is actually mankind taking steps toward the end of a plank over shark infested waters.

When it all comes down to it, these scientists are motivated by nothing but greed. Imagine how much money the person who discovers a marker for a particular disease will earn. Insurance companies all over will pay for this information and use it to save money for themselves.

By the time most of us will get to be of insurance-buying age, many companies could institute genetic screening, eliminating from their pools of applicants anyone prone to heart attacks, cancer or anything else they happen to find undesirable. That may be you.

It's hard to blame insurance companies for this. What kind of business could they run if they failed to cut unnecessary losses? The idea is not to let progress get too far, but how can that be achieved? The only way is to cut off genetic research as a whole.

It's true a lot of discoveries being made can be considered beneficial to society, but before we can evaluate the progress, we have to consider the costs. For every positive change that comes out of such research, there are negative implications, which the public is unable to see.

How far are we going to let this go? Over the course of time, nature has developed a way of continuing life from generation to generation. This system has worked extremely well for millions of years. Is it our role to tinker with such success?

I can picture a future in which anyone can walk into a convenience store and place an order for a child, as if it was a pizza. "Yeah, I'd like a medium sized male with brown hair/blue eyes, and little toes please." I know this may seem a little far-fetched, but who's to say it's beyond the realm of possibility? Scientists have been exceeding all of our expectations for years now.

The questions aren't just scientific anymore. They are questions of ethics. These are the issues that will be important in the coming years.

Consider this situation; you and your husband/wife are expecting your first child. The doctor informs you that they have performed a genetic screening, and it has revealed that your child is going to be mentally retarded, to what extent they don't know. The choice you have to make is whether to keep the baby or not. Add in the fact that if you decide to keep the baby, because of your prior knowledge of the condition, the insurance will not cover extra medical expenses. What do you do?

This situation and others like it are bound to become more and more common as time and science move along. People must be educated in these matters before it becomes too late. It's time to halt the so-called "progress" of science until we can decide whether or not it is really progress. The future is in our hands. Are we going to let a bunch of greedy scientists decide for us in what direction our world is going to head, or are we going to decide for ourselves?

Tarantino and Smith College

It was like an opening scene of a Quentin Tarantino movie. We were sitting in a diner having a cup of coffee and discussing the plan of attack. It was Saturday night and we were hanging out in Northampton. The clock was against us.

David K. Chan

It had been a while since Johnny, Homer and I had done anything worth being labeled "fun." After having dinner at the dining commons, we made it imperative that we would have fun that night. It was time for a change of scene. It was time for risks.

After cancelling out Mount Holyoke College, we decided to go check out Smith. We had no particular reason as to why we chose Smith, only the fact that it sounded cool.

"Smith sounds cool, man," I said.

"Yeah, Smith's cool," said Johnny.

"Why don't you call up your cool friend and get some dorm names?" I asked Johnny.

Johnny called up his friend and got a few names of some dorms and their party times. We had a list of about half a dozen parties. But there was one minor catch, the parties were rumored to be semi-formal. I'd never dress semi- formally for a college party. Never. It just wouldn't be a party.

"What does that parking sign say?" I asked Homer who was sitting in the passenger seat.

Homer squinted. "It says tow zone. No parking between 12:01 a.m. and 6 a.m."

"What? That's absurd! Who checks parking that late at night?" I asked.

"Just park in the quad, dude," said Johnny.

"That sounds cool. Let's do it," I said.

We were three idiots standing outside Morrow looking in through the elegant glass door. There were lots of balloons, a chandelier, a lobby that looks like a museum, and a glamorous looking woman sitting at a desk with "the list." We weren't on the list. We didn't even know there was a list. Every party had a list and we weren't on any.

As we turned to walk back to my car, a couple walked by us. They exchanged glances with us. The woman was wearing a really nice dress and her date was dressed, you guessed it, semi-formally. The guy had a shirt and tie.

"I bet he's from Amherst College," sneered Homer.

The clock was ticking. The diner was about to close. The only other customers in the joint were two young women sitting at a small table diagonally from us quietly conversing. The three of us agreed that it was the worst night of our lives. Being rejected from a Smith party was an embarrassing slap in the face. We had walked around all night. I was determined to write a column criticizing Smith. The system was stupid. Smith's final hope lied in our last attempt to find a party — an after-hours party.

"John, if I'm dreaming, please don't wake me!" I screamed over the loud Caribbean music.

We couldn't believe where we were. The champagne was free, women were wearing dresses, a live band was playing, and the place was packed. It was no doubt the best party I had ever been to. The atmosphere was rockin'.

I grabbed a balloon and sucked in some helium.

"Hey lady, can ya pour me another glass of champagne?" I asked, smiling with the high pitched helium-stricken voice.

She laughed. "Sure, but don't suck up too much helium, we don't want you to float away on us."

Smith College prevailed.

Letters to the Editor

Police needed for safe campus

To the editor:

I am writing in response to Ken Miller's letter in the Collegian on Wednesday, April 5, titled "University cops enforce police state." I couldn't help but to look at the organization he was writing under, after reading the title of what I was sure was going to be someone else rambling about how unfair life is. Not surprisingly, the lad wrote under the Alliance for Student Power, so that he wouldn't have to state his opinion all by himself.

I would like to point out a few MAJOR discrepancies in the garbage that young Ken felt was necessary to write. First of all, he stated that there are drugs, streakers and violent people on campus. The problem arises when he contradicts himself by saying he's glad the police are here for protection and then goes on to say that they are "inherently, structurally, against us in our role as students." Oops! I think someone is a little unclear about their thoughts. This implies that Mr. Miller has no problem with drugs, streakers and violence in the dorms and that the police should not get involved in preventing such. It also implies that "our role as students" is to be druggies, streakers and violent individuals. I don't remember those attributes being required when I applied to this university. I guess I'll go to the admissions office to look at an updated application.

Secondly, the reading audience is presented with the revelation that the police should not care if students buy and sell drugs. Allow me to clarify for Mr. Miller why the police should be, and are, concerned with the buying and selling of drugs. Guess what Ken, drugs are illegal. There's your word for the day.

Thirdly, we are treated with the notion that leaders in the community, government and administration are evil, since they apparently put the police here just to suppress the lives of students who "are trying to make a self-conscious decision about the society they want to live in." Actually, Ken, you and everyone else put them here when you pay taxes — get used to it. It also goes on to say that therefore the police keep the students "from rising up and acting on the system." Allow me to clarify for Ken once again. The police are here to enforce the laws that are made (to prevent people from acting illegally — remember that word, Ken?) and to offer assistance to those in need of protection or help. Therefore I highly doubt these organizations are working to make the lives of little misguided students, like Ken, a complete terror. In fact, if students were basically allowed to "rise up," which I assume means revolt, and have absolutely no contact with any form of enforcement or public safety, then we would have an anarchist society. Now that's just the ultimate in organization and safety!

I would also like to point out that the letter tries to get people to realize that the University is basically a police state where the students have absolutely no freedom — a.k.a. a communist state — as they prepare for a career. Wow! I guess Ken and I can agree that college is supposed to format one for the career path they are seeking. However, I never knew that it was such a terrible injustice to prepare oneself to make a living. And seeing as one is free to choose his/her course of study, it sounds to me as though there is some freedom here.

Finally, the last paragraph states that the rich put the police here to "break our spirit" and get us used to authority. I would love to know where Ken is from, because he obviously lives in a place where there is total freedom and no authority to get in his way, since it seems he has had no experience with rules and the police are only here to teach compliance (a big word, Ken, look it up). Once again it's clarification time for Ken. The rich didn't put the police here to keep you down. Everyone supplies the police by paying taxes (sound familiar?) and realizing that without them, chaos would reign, something you seem to want.

I hope that Ken realizes the foolishness of his ideas. All he has to do is read the article in the same edition of the Collegian that commends Deputy Chief Barbara O'Connor for her work on the UMass police squad and resulting promotion. It is people like Ms. O'Connor that help to make for a safe environment.

'Earnest' tips off a Wilde weekend

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

The biggest star on campus this weekend has been dead for 95 years.

But poet, playwright and colorful scribe Oscar Wilde will be very much alive as the subject of a weekend-long celebration of the centennial anniversary of his most famous play, The Importance of Being Earnest. The events include six performances of the play as well as a "talkback" session with the directors, designers and cast and a symposium bringing together Wilde scholars from as far as Great Britain to discuss the works of this singular artist.

The 100-year birthday of Earnest isn't the only reason for the recent renaissance surrounding Wilde. This also marks the year that Wilde has been officially acknowledged in Westminster Abbey's Poet's Corner aside England's most noted literary personas. And then there's the anniversary of that notorious trial; a "decency" conviction that landed the flamboyantly homosexual Wilde in prison with hard labor (homosexuality was illegal in Britain until the 1970s).

This weekend, though, is primed to remember the artist as well as his legacy. The centerpiece is the Department of Theater production of Earnest, which opened last evening.

Being readily described as one of the Western theater's most perfect plays as well as its numerous productions over the years was a daunting task for directors Virginia Scott and Richard Trousdell.

"The challenge is trying to come at this material fresh," says Scott. "To try to get rid of your expectations and to read it freshly. Face it, there will be people in the audience who can recite whole chunks of the play."

According to Scott, Earnest's appeal lies in its timeless nature and the fact that in many ways, "it is a perfect play" and this is what the audiences will react to.

"It's a play that lives up to its billing as a tight, good comic experience," says Scott. "It has a striking integrity all of its own."

There was a temptation to fiddle with a play that not only exists in multiple versions and drafts but has been interpreted in numerous ways in different productions, Scott said.

"But then you realize, ultimately, that Wilde was right in choices."

The Importance of Being Earnest will be presented on April 6–8 and 13–15 at 8 p.m. in the Curtain Theater of the Fine Arts Center. Tickets $6 general; $3.50 students and senior citizens. The "talkback" session will be held after tonight's performance.

Leftover Salmon, a fresh catch

By Jorma Kansanen

Diversity.

Besides its meaning in our overly self-proclaimed, open- minded climate of the Pioneer Valley, in some cases it actually has a relevance that holds water.

Tonight at Pearl Street, the Boulder, Colo. based Leftover Salmon will bring the true sense of the word to the stage. With their self-proclaimed style called "polyethnic cajun slamgrass," the five member group — from the place that brought The Sample's Sean Kelly and Big Head Todd lead man Todd Mohr to the spotlight — will surely capture the curiosity, and the admiration, that it deserves.

Formed in 1988, when the bluegrass oriented Left Hand String Band joined together with the folksy Salmon Heads, the band has captured the hearts of its area fans. Selling out places like the famous Fox Theater in Boulder, Leftover Salmon is now looking to expand beyond their Midwest base. With their release Bridges To Bert in 1992, their professionalism and musical knowledge was shown in conjunction with the unique live show and sound they possess.

The band is led by Vince "Corned Beef" Herman, whose improvisational acting background comes out in his singing. Changing anywhere from a stanza to a complete song's lyrics in the course of its performance, what remains in chord structure is thrown out in meaning and content. That is, expect the unexpected, but do not be afraid of its results, because it works.

Joining Herman are Drew Emmit (mandolin), Mark Vann (banjo), Michael Wooten (drums) and newest member Tye M. North (bass). Emmit and Vann are both still in The Left Hand String Band and their talents and playing styles are what make up the uniqueness of the band's overall sound. Wooten has more than shown for himself with his work with the likes of Carole King, Chris Hillman and Southern Pacific. The left handed bass stylings of North were brought to the band of late, and their meeting at the Oregon County Fair with the Portland native is what brought him to the band.

Say what you will, but the diverse nature of a band that does everything from David Bromberg to Violent Femmes covers is enough to see them for curiosity sake. One thing is for sure, once you hear and see them live you will not forget the experience.

Tickets for tonight's Leftover Salmon show at Pearl Street will be $6 in advance, $8 at the door. Doors open at 8:30 p.m. and call 584-7771 for further info.

Talk details ties between dual German oppression

By Sanuber Denizman
Collegian Correspondent

Education is the only answer to conquering Anti-Semitism and Anti-Gypsism in Germany, according to Wolfgang Wippermann, a professor of modern history at Free University in Berlin.

Wippermann spoke about problems concerning both Gypsies and Jews in his Tuesday evening lecture entitled "Anti-Semitism and Anti-Gypsism: The Prosecution of Gypsies and Jews in Germany Since the Reformation," to a group of approximately 20 people at Memorial Hall.

He approached the topic by comparing the historical prosecution of both groups.

The comparison between Gypsies and Jews goes back to the sixteenth century, Wippermann said, when Martin Luther demanded that "Jews be treated like Gypsies" — meaning that they be expelled or murdered in cold blood.

Historically, gypsies were referred to as "half-human," in their migration over centuries from India to Iran, Turkey, Greece and then to all over Europe, he said.

"If a Gypsy does not know how to behave in a particular situation then the state should teach him," was the educational idea of enlightenment, Wippermann said.

The same idea of education underlies the Jewish version of emancipation.

"That in itself justifies the comparison of Jews to Gypsies and the creation of the same racially motivated ideology," Wippermann said.

In the 19th century, "some gypsies," but not all, got civil rights as German citizens; as a methodology they were regarded to be as foreigners and because of racially motivated reasons, expelled.

However, according to Wippermann, what happened to Gypsies was a "genocide" that rests on the shoulders of modern Germany as a second Holocaust.

Today, eight to 10 million Gypsies live in Europe, but the fact that there are more gypsies than Jews doesn't mean that they were less prosecuted, Wippermann said.

Even though the Gypsies were never so dangerous for a Christian state as Jews, the comparison between Gypsies and Jews led to a racialization and radicalization of both Jews and Gypsies, Wippermann said.

"Gypsies were prosecuted against even more vigorously than Jews."

A "normal" gypsy woman gives birth to about 12-15 children, and the fact that we don't know how many gypsies immigrated to Europe in thirteenth century makes it impossible to figure out how many Gypsies were killed.

However, according to Wippermann, what happened to Gypsies was a "genocide" that rests on the shoulders of modern Germany as a second Holocaust.

Today, eight to 10 million Gypsies live in Europe, but the fact that there are more gypsies than Jews doesn't mean that they were less prosecuted, Wippermann said.

respective best events is within reach.

Laing (vault) and Swartz (uneven bars) are currently ranked third in the Northeast Region, with average scores of 9.856 and 9.812. Although Tolhurst's highest individual event rank is eighth in the balance beam (9.706), she is "flat out" consistent on all events. With her fifth overall regional ranking in the all-around (38.575), she has shown that she does the job, no matter the event.

To Kuzara the team comes first, but he can not deny the positives when it comes to his three top all-arounders.

"I do not like to talk about individuals, but it is important to have as much representation at Nationals that you can have," Kuzara said. "This year, we have a legitimate chance to have two, or all three go. It will be important for the program and the team, because they will be taking a little piece of everyone if they make it."

Coming off of some of the best training sessions of the year in the last three weeks, the team is hyped up and prepared for the challenge, according to Kuzara. After one of their most consistent team performances at the A-10 Championships, where they hit 21 out of 24 routines, the stage is set for a chance at the national spotlight in Athens.

"The three routines that had falls in them [in the A-10s], the people were able to come back and the team was able to survive that," Kuzara said. "We need another performance like that."

shots at Brew in the second frame, ending up with 36 shots to UMass' 18 altogether. The honorable mention All-American from Annapolis has impressed McClellan so far, compiling a .660 save percentage, good for fourth best in the nation.

Freshman Joanna Dignazio has followed up on her 1994 All-American season at Strath Haven H.S. in Wallingford, Pa., leading the team early in the season with five goals.

"We are looking to make some things work, try to take some risks defensively and learn what we exactly got to do," McClellan said.

Last year against St. Joseph's and Villanova, the Minutewomen came out with an even split, 1-1.

"St. Joseph's is a good team, and they have gotten steadily stronger from last year," McClellan said. "We did not give Villanova a lot of credit in our game with them last season. We are going to need our athletic and scoring ability, and just plain jout effort them to win."

East with 16 points each.

This game is one of the most underappreciated. More people should watch this game that occurs every year around Final Four time. Many NBA superstars such as Michael Jordan, Chris Mullin, Patrick Ewing and Chris Webber have all played in this game at one point, which just proves that this game showcases potential superstars.

• The injury that ended the season for Chicago Blackhawks' All-star center Jeremy Roenick was one that might not hurt the Blackhawks as much as people think. If you look at a team like the 1993-94 New Jersey Devils, you can find many similarities. The Devils weren't exactly the strongest team up the middle with Bernie Nicholls as their top center. Nicholls finished an injury-plagued season last year with the Devils with only 19 goals.

This year, Nicholls has surpassed that total in fewer games as he's scored 22 goals in 35 games and is fifth in the league in scoring. Both defenses were anchored by a Norris Trophy (top defenseman) candidate, the Devils by Scott Stevens and the Hawks by two-time winner Chris Chelios.

The Devils last year were led by Rookie of the Year goaltender Martin Brodeur and this year the Hawks are led by two-time Vezina Trophy (top goalie) winner Ed Belfour. Last year, the Devils had an excellent supporting cast with Claude Lemiuex, Stephane Richer, Bruce Driver, John MacLean and Valeri Zelepukin.

This year, the Hawks have an excellent supporting cast that includes Joe Murphy, Tony Amonte, Gary Suter, Murray Craven and Patrick Poulin. Add to the Blackhawks' supporting cast the fact that they have the league's best power-play, and you still have a legitimate Stanley Cup contender. Roenick's presence will be missed but the supporting cast is capable of reaching the ultimate goal.

teams in the tournament played stronger and rougher than teams in the East," Hickey said. "They were more experienced and executed plays quicker than we did."

Several players have stepped up for UMass in the past two weeks and have provided the team with a lift. Sophomore Vicky Bamond is the statistical leader recording 26 goals in the Minutewomen's first 11 games. In addition to scoring, Newcomb expects Bamond to fill the role as team leader.

Hickey has also come alive for the Minutewomen and has been a definite scoring threat.

"What we've seen from her in the last two weeks has been unbelievable," said Newcomb, who believes that with confidence her play could improve even more. "She could be one of the most dominant players in the New England Region if she would let herself do it."

Women head to NCAA Regionals

Laing, Swartz, Tolhurst could all make Nationals in their respective events

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

For the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team (14–12 overall, 7–3 in the Atlantic 10), this weekend will be both a statement and a stepping stone.

With the NCAA Northeast Regionals this Saturday in Kent, Ohio, the No. 3 seed in the region (average team score of 190.175) will be capping off an outstanding season. Also, with a strong second place finish, there will be the chance for an at-large bid to the N C A A Championships this April 20–22; or even better, with a win they will get the automatic bid for the trip to Athens, Ga.

Even after their third place finish at the A–10 Championships, the weeks since have been productive. For Massachusetts coach Dave Kuzara and his team, they are trying to put the Regionals into proper context.

"What has improved for us the last three weeks is our confidence level," Kuzara said. "If we have a fall, we can not let it get us down. Anything can happen. I feel like the team is ready for the challenge and they are really focused on this weekend."

"We need to think of this as another meet," said sophomore Tara Swartz. "Just put it as doing good and hitting all the routines, because either way, we have made a point this year.

"Whether we win or not, I think we have pretty much showed that UMass is planning to be at the top."

When it comes to the other six teams that will be competing this weekend, UMass has had a winning record at 4–3 against them on the season. The No. 1 seed and No. 11 nationally ranked squad of Penn State (17–13, 193.487 average score) would appear to be the favorites coming in, but not so. After a third place finish in the Big Ten Championships, and a loss to the Minutewomen in Michigan on March 18, the injury hampered Lady Lions are literally limping in to Kent.

> "What has improved for us the last three weeks is our confidence level. If we have a fall, we can not let it get us down. Anything can happen. I feel like the team is ready for the challenge and they are really focused on this weekend."
> – Coach David Kuzara.

With No. 2 seed Kent State (7–12, 190.725), the home meet advantage might not be there, as they are also decimated by injuries. A fifth place in the postseason MAAC Championship must have been disappointing, as what exactly they are going to bring to the meet is still up in the air. The healthy No. 4 seed UNH Wildcats (10–7, 189.856) could be the dark horse, according to Kuzara, but the unknowns seem to be in favor for UMass.

NATHAN MARTIN / COLLEGIAN

(from l. to r.) Lianne Laing, Tara Swartz and J.J. Tolhurst have the best shot to represent the Minutewomen at the NCAA Nationals by performing well this weekend at the Regionals.

"That just gives us more confidence going in," Kuzara said, "as far as that because we are not a team that is going to just beat everybody.

"We are going to grind it out, and see what happens when the dust settles."

In the individual competitions, this year the team has a distinct opportunity to send three athletes to Athens. In past years, the team's success was with one athlete, like with 1993's Tammy Marshall. This season, the chances for Swartz, junior J.J. Tolhurst and sophomore Lianne Laing to make the Nationals on their

Bard sees Braves battling Indians in World Series

Around the Horn with Andrew Bard

I'll be the first to admit that I am looking forward to the start of the Major League Baseball season, even though I was one of those people who said that they didn't care if baseball never came back. Yes, the strike did get under our skin pretty deep, but in reality we are all glad that we don't have to see all those butchers, bakers and candlestick makers known as replacement players.

My very early World Series prediction is the Cleveland Indians versus the Atlanta Braves. The Indians have the best nucleus in baseball with Albert Belle, Kenny Lofton and Carlos Baerga. Indians GM John Hart will likely acquire a veteran starter to make their pitching staff even better.

The Braves, by far, have the best pitching staff in baseball led by three–peat Cy Young Award winner Greg Maddux. The offense is very potent with Dave Justice, Fred McGriff, Ryan Klesko and now Marquis Grissom.

• The UCLA Bruins won their 11th National Men's Basketball title on Monday in fine fashion as they defeated the defending National Champion Arkansas Razorbacks. The Bruins played all but three minutes of the game without their floor general, Tyus Edney.

Edney was nursing a sprained right wrist and his job was handed to sophomore point guard Cameron Dollar. Dollar's steady play along with the excellent play of freshman Toby Bailey, and the dominance of senior All–American Ed O'Bannon, proved to be the difference as they shut down the Hogs inside–outside game of Corliss Williamson and Scotty Thurman.

Hats off to UCLA coach Jim Harrick who finally gets the orangutan off his back and out of the shadow of the Westwood Wizard John Wooden.

• The debut of FOX NHL Sunday was not impressive at all. James Brown was his usual solid self in comparing him to when he does FOX NFL Sunday, and his partner Dave Mahoney reminded me a lot of the flamboyant Terry Bradshaw of FOX NFL Sunday. One thing that has to go is the fight between the Transformers after a team scores a goal. That was undoubtedly one of the most unprofessional clips in the history of televised sports. FOX should also take time to leave the game they're covering and show a highlight or two of another game. Knocking FOX after their first NHL broadcast isn't exactly fair but hopefully things will turn around.

• The McDonald's All–American High School Basketball Game was once again another slam fest for our nation's best young talent. The West prevailed and were led by 6–foot–10 Kevin Garnett of Farragut Academy in Chicago, who scored 18 points and pulled down 11 rebounds. Garnett, who was given the John Wooden Award as the game's MVP, also contributed with four assists, three blocks and a steal. Kansas signee Paul Pierce scored a game–high 28 points for the West. North Carolina signee Vince Carter and California signee Shareef Abdur–Rahim led the

Baseball looks for a complete weekend

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

It matters not who starts, they say, but who finishes. For the University of Massachusetts baseball team this season, the pitchers that start are often the ones who finish, or at least they come pretty close.

The starting rotation for the Minutemen in 1995 has been complete — as in complete games, one of the strengths of this year's squad.

"If you get a complete game from your starter, for the most part, you are going to pick up the victory," Massachusetts coach Mike Stone said. "We've been really fortunate to have our rotation go the distance lately."

In last weekend's three–game series against St. Joseph's, all wins for Massachusetts, the rotation of Jay Murphy, Chad Paronto and Scott Barnsby was strong. Murphy (2–2) sparkled his last time out throwing a complete game, two– hitter, a performance that earned him Pitcher of the Week honors from the Atlantic 10 Conference.

Paronto (2–1) went the distance in the back half of the doubleheader against the Owls, giving up only five hits while striking out two despite walking four.

The same trio will get the nod for Stone in this weekend's three–game tilt against A–10 rival Temple, as the Minutemen (11–6) ride in on a seven–game winning streak.

The latest victory for Massachusetts came last Tuesday night against Connecticut, 6–2. Sophomore righthander Jason Bennett pitched, yes, a complete–game three hitter to shut down the Huskies in Storrs, Conn.

The downside to the Massachusetts starters hurling complete games is the lack of work for the pitchers in the Minuteman bullpen.

No. 12 Seton Hall proves too tough for women's tennis

By Michael Brown
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team battled a tough Seton Hall squad last Sunday and were defeated handily by the No. 12 team in the East, 8–1.

The lone bright spot of the match came from exchange student Catalina Mejia, who crushed her opponent in the No. 6 singles spot 6–1, 6–0. Mejia, a native of Colombia, had never competed on hard courts prior to coming to UMass and adds much needed strength to the Minutewomen attack. UMass coach Judy Dixon said she is very pleased with her new acquisition.

"Catalina is a wonderful South American baseliner," Dixon said. "She does not miss the ball."

Team captain Liesl Silton represented UMass at No. 1 singles and fell 6–3, 6–3. Silton, last year's New England Champion, still has not performed to the level she is capable of and Dixon is waiting for her confidence to come around.

"I think Liesl's downfall has been her mental game right now," Dixon said. "This match against Seton Hall was better but I think she can do better than that. She practices and plays hard and her confidence needs to come back."

Competing at No. 2 singles for the Minutewomen was freshman Lana Gorodetskaya. Gorodetskaya, the usual No. 4 singles player, was not expected by Dixon to beat the Pirate's No. 2 player and lost 6–0, 6–1.

"Lana has been playing the best on the team," Dixon said. "I just wanted her to go out and bang the ball, and that's what she did."

Trading pole position with Gorodetskaya at No. 4 for UMass was freshman Noelle Orsini. Orsini, who is accustomed to the No. 2 spot, was dropped by Dixon to increase her chances for victory. Orsini battled tough and won the second set but was handed a 6–1, 7–6, 7–5 loss.

"Noelle had been playing the No. 2 and was really taking her licks," Dixon said. "I am working on Noelle's ability to stay in a match both mentally and physically, and at No. 2, if she is getting blown out every match, then she doesn't have a chance to work that out."

In doubles action the Minutewomen were swept. Silton and freshman Caroline Steele were beaten 6–0, 6–4 in the No. 1 match. In No. 2 doubles, Orsini and sophomore Liz Durant lost 6–4, 6–4 and the No. 3 duo of Gorodetskaya and freshman Amy Sidran were defeated 6–3, 6–3.

The squad is currently on the road to the Mt. St. Mary's tournament that features five schools including Mt. St. Mary's, St. John's, UConn, Pace University and UMass.

"This tournament is our level," Dixon said. "There are no teams much better than us and their are no teams that are much worse than us. So this is a real test."

Women's lax wins first, faces 'Nova and St. Joe's

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team picked up its first win of the season with an 8–7 victory over Holy Cross yesterday afternoon. Sophomore Stephanie Walsh, the leading scorer for the Minutewomen, tallied four goals, including two in the first eight minutes of action.

Freshman Kate Brew made seven saves between the pipes for Massachusetts, as the Minutewomen outshot the Crusaders 20–13. Holy Cross cut the lead to one with 43 seconds left on the clock but were unable to put the tying goal past Brew.

The Minutewomen (1–3) are home for two games this weekend, as they will be facing Villanova and St. Joseph's at Totman Field. The Minutewomen will look to remedy an up and down start to the season, as consistency has been at a premium.

To Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan, the respect for the teams they are facing is there, but they have to take the initiative in starting fast from the tipoff.

"We are looking to come out really strong in the beginning," said McClellan. "We will try to get a good lead, and work on some things.

"I think we have a chance to win these games, but that is always a curse when you say that. The kids are excited, they are looking forward to playing hard and working for the 'W'."

The first three games for UMass this year have been one of peaks and valleys.

In their opener against Brown, a triple overtime heartbreaker negated what was a total team offensive and defensive effort in the 8–7 loss. At Totman last week, the Minutewomen came out flat on defense, and were unable to use a second half run to make up the deficit, losing to Yale 13–5.

There was no fun on April 1, as a strong start against a tough Temple squad on the road was lost with seven unanswered goals, 15–4. Two late goals on Brew in the last 40 seconds of the first half appeared to drain UMass.

The twins Alex and Claudia Ovchinnikoff took control in the second half, as they both scored two goals to pace the Owls.

The defense seemed to back off the Temple offense, as they fired 19

Daut, Cardenas lead way in victory

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

Senior hurler Kelly Daut pitched seven innings of one–hit ball to lead the University of Massachusetts softball team to a 5–1 victory over Hartford yesterday in West Hartford, Conn.

Daut, now 10–5 on the season, also struck out 11 batters while walking none. In 98.1 innings pitched, Daut has struck out 69 batters, while walking only 31, and has a 1.21 earned run average.

The win was UMass' fifth in a row and it improves the Minutewomen to 15–11 (4–1 in the Atlantic 10) while the Hawks drop to 12–2–1. The two teams were supposed to play two but the second game was cancelled due to cold weather conditions.

Sophomore third baseman Sam Cardenas continued to shine, extending her hitting streak to 12 games in a row, while going 1–4 with two runs batted in. For the season, Cardenas is batting .373 (second highest on the team) with two home runs (also second on the team), a team–high 31 hits, a team–high 22 RBIs and a team–high 20 runs scored. She is also tied for the team lead in doubles, along with freshman Kim Gutridge, with seven.

The Minutewomen got all the runs they would need in the top of the second when two runners crossed the plate giving them a 2–0 lead. UMass added another run in the third making it 3–0 before the Hawks could get a score in the bottom of the fourth inning to make it 3–1.

UMass scored two more in the top of the sixth to finish off its scoring.

Sophomore outfielder Stephanie Mareina led the Minutewomen offensively hitting a triple while going 2–4 on the day. She also scored a run. Freshmen Tracey Osier and Gutridge both went 1–2, stole a base and scored a run.

Hawk hurler Danielle Simoneau took the loss for the Hawks, dropping her record to 8–1–1 on the season, and got the only hit off Daut.

Hitting to all fields

Outfielder Chris Martens, although going hitless against the Hawks, still leads the Minutewomen with a .400 batting average. The sophomore also leads UMass with three home runs and is second on the team in hits (31), doubles (4), RBIs (18), runs scored (13) and slugging percentage (.573).

Daut is third on the team in batting average (.286) while Osier (.280) and Gutridge (.278) are fourth and fifth, respectively. Freshman Kelly Buckley is third on the team in RBIs with 14 while Gutridge is fourth with 11 runs knocked in.

Minutewomen to host tourney for first time

By Teri Klein
Collegian Staff

After gaining valuable experience in the Pomona Tournament in California (March 24–26), the University of Massachusetts women's water polo team hopes to improve this weekend when it hosts the Eastern Water Polo Association Northern Division Tournament at Totman pool for the first time ever.

Eight teams make up the tournament and the Minutewomen will play games against four of those teams, Amherst, M.I.T., Bowdoin and Dartmouth.

UMass' toughest competitor is expected to be M.I.T., a team whom the Minutewomen have never beaten. Massachusetts coach Bob Newcomb feels that this could be a changing trend.

"This is the first time we've played M.I.T. with the feeling that we are capable of beating them," he said. "I'd like to see us win all four games."

Despite entering the tournament with a 4–6 record, Massachusetts is feeling confident in its level of play and has high expectations.

This new found confidence stems from the conversion that the team had during the Pomona tournament. In California, the Minutewomen came together and began to play as a unit, not just a bunch of individuals. Newcomb was pleased with the change.

"It was an amazing transformation. We came together and decided to play as a team," he said.

Assistant coach Dan McAuliffe agreed.

"It was remarkable seeing the difference in play before California and in scrimmage after. The team is much more intense."

That intensity emerged from the more physical style of play that UMass participated against in the tournament. Western teams generally play a rougher game and the Minutewomen had to become a stronger team in order to compete.

Sophomore Barbara Hickey commented on the difference. "Most Rally attacks violence; women reclaim power

By Connie Cass
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Women's rights supporters rallied near the Capitol yesterday to protest "violence against women" — a term they applied not only to rape and battering but also to political assaults on welfare spending, abortion and affirmative action.

"As women have been able to take some small measure of power, we're facing a fierce backlash," Patricia Ireland, president of the National Organization for Women (NOW), told the crowd.

Thousands of people spread across the National Mall for the five–hour rally, organized by NOW and endorsed by more than 700 groups, including abortion–rights supporters, labor unions, civil rights groups, gay and lesbian organizations, environmentalists, socialists, victims' rights advocates, and welfare recipients.

The U.S. Park Police, using helicopters, counted 50,000 people at the rally. Ireland gave a much larger estimate of 200,000. Coming at the end of the first 100 days of the new GOP–led Congress, the "Rally for Women's Lives" focused heavily on the agendas of House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R–Ga., and other conservative politicians.

Speakers voiced fears that Congress would curtail abortion rights, cut spending on welfare programs for women and children, dismantle affirmative action programs for women and minorities, and cut funding to prevent domestic violence and aid its victims. They equated what they called "political violence" with physical attacks.

"Be it personal terror or political terror, it has just one purpose — control," said Eleanor Smeal, president of The Feminist Majority. "We are the majority. Our rights will only be taken away if we allow the terrorists to reign."

Hoisting signs that read "NOW, Not Newt" and "Republicans Don't Need Abortions. They Eat Their Young," demonstrators chanted "We won't go back." A few women stripped to their bras, and some went topless in the warm sun. Men and children also were sprinkled through the crowd.

"There should be as many men here as women here," the Rev. Jesse Jackson said. "Men must know that none of us are secure until all of us are secure."

Among the speakers were relatives of people killed in anti–abortion shootings, including June Barrett, whose husband James was shot to death while escorting a doctor into a Pensacola, Fla., abortion clinic.

Habitat repairs Amherst house

By Scott Martin
Collegian Correspondent

Mother Nature did not provide the ideal climate, but volunteers gathered to help provide shelter for the needy this weekend.

As part of the Habitat for Humanity event, volunteers from the Five College area performed repairs on a house at 76 Old Town Road, behind the University of Massachusetts parking office on Saturday. Sixty volunteers participated.

When repairs are completed, a low–income family from UMass will occupy the house, according to William Rose, associate vice chancellor for campus services.

"The main thing is getting people in the Five College area to help the community, and tell people that their is work to do," said Elizabeth Allen, a UMass senior bachelor's degree with individual concentration (BDIC) major.

Students spackle–up town

Volunteers spent the day spackling, sanding and painting walls, ceilings and cabinets in the house. They also replaced and painted doors, said David Ambary, a UMass senior psychology major.

This was part of the eleventh annual National Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness' Hunger Cleanup. The goal was to raise $1000 and combat hunger and homelessness, according to Missy Finocchio, the Hunger Cleanup coordinator.

The Habitat for Humanity was only one of many restoration projects that were conducted throughout the town on Saturday.

Keith Williams, associate vice chancellor for University advancement said that he believed the day was a success. He stopped by the house in the afternoon to check on progress.

"This is a great project," he said. "People from the University are acting as good neighbors to the community. This sets a good model for us all to emulate."

Williams said he feels the University has an obligation to help the town of Amherst.

"Amherst is our host community. We should use all our resources to help the community," Williams said.

According to Linton Harrington, a Holyoke Community College student and member of MASSPIRG, said that low income housing is an important issue for students.

"Students tend to stay on campus and don't get involved enough with the community," Harrington said.

This particular event attracted students and other interested volunteers.

Lou Werneiman, a father who drove down from New York to visit his daughter at Smith College, saw a flyer for the event and decided to participate — regardless of dress codes.

Werneiman volunteered in a three–piece suit, something he found himself later regretting.

"I didn't realize I'd be working with sheetrock," he said. "I would've dressed for it."

Surprise snow storm

While Werneiman was surprised by the sheetrock, many others were equally shocked by the snowfall.

"I can't believe it snowed," Ambary said. "This blows my mind."

Some scheduled events had to be cancelled at the last minute, Allen said.

Originally planned were awareness tables, a concert by Hullabaloo, a local band, and a 15–team volleyball tournament, Allen said.

The only volleyball game that was attempted was cut short after 20 minutes, Allen said.

The snow did have one positive effect, Ambary said. "At the least the snow got everyone inside working."

The work on the house will continue on April 22.

"We got a lot accomplished today," Ambary said, "and hopefully by the end of the semester the house will be finished."

RSOs to file for space as competition grows

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center/Student Union (CC/SU) Commission met last Thursday night in anticipation of the immense chore they have ahead of themselves: considering University of Massachusetts organizations' applications and renewal forms as they embark upon the Space Allocation Process.

As of Thursday night, five of the approximate 63 Registered Student Organizations (RSO), Graduate Student Organizations (GSO), and agencies with office space have passed in their completed forms, according to Matthew Auger, Commission chair.

"All RSOs, GSOs and agencies need to submit an application form by April 12 to room 817 of the Campus Center," Auger said. The office closes at 5 p.m.

According to William Stevens, former Commission facilities officer, there are about 180 mailboxes representing the total number of RSOs, GSOs and agencies at UMass. The 63 organizations make up approximately one–third of the total organizations.

The Commission is expecting the overwhelming majority of the applications or renewal forms next week, Auger said.

Organizations that desire office space are facing an impending deadline to file their forms, and the Commission plans to review all that are passed in over Patriot's Day weekend. The chore has the potential to be laborious, contingent upon how many applications meet deadline.

Auger said he has personally visited many of the organizations and informed them of the approaching deadline.

There appears to be a significant amount of groups unaware of the "urgency," as they are assuming a passive attitude, saying, "We're not going to move," Auger said.

"Even RSOs, GSOs or agencies who don't want to move need to send in an application," Auger said. "All RSO, GSO and agency office space is subject to review. The Campus Center/Student Union Commission reserves the right to move anybody."

Esther Salas, Commission vending officer, said there are currently many organizations occupying "humongous" offices.

With the amount of organizations superseding the amount of office space, the Commission chair wondered if offices will be split.

"Are we going to micro–manage these offices?" Auger asked.

In anticipating what's ahead, Commission member Colin Cavell considered the forms they expect organizations to complete and return.

"There is no objective criteria that we're all going to follow," Cavell said.

Decisions are expected in early May, Auger said.

In related Commission business, discussion concerning a Latin American mural given to the Commission by AHORA, the UMass Spanish–speaking organization, are ongoing. Auger said. The Commission is deciding where in the CC/SU Complex to put it.

Also, the Commission began revising their policy on signs, posters and banners displayed throughout the CC/SU Complex, in display cases and on balcony banners, as well as other areas the Commission mandates.

Student charged with assault in domestic dispute

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student was charged with nine separate counts early last week, including several counts of assault and battery and threatening to commit murder.

Chip Chaunamom, 20, of Lowell, was charged with two counts of assault and battery, threatening to commit a crime to wit; murder, two counts of malicious destruction of property over $250, three counts of domestic assault and battery, and breaking and entering at night with an intent to commit a felony.

At approximately midnight on April 3, Chaunamom was denied access to his girlfriend's room in Thatcher Residence Hall. Chaunamom then allegedly broke the door down and assaulted three women that were in the room, according to police documents.

Two counts of assault and battery were for the friends of the victim. Chaunamom allegedly assaulted the two women when they tried to stop him, police said.

According to police documents, Chaunamom had a hammer and destroyed a computer monitor and a television set belonging to the victim. Because each piece of property was worth over $250, the crime is considered a felony.

Chaunamom allegedly verbally threatened the victim in a manner that he was charged with threatening to commit murder, police said.

Two of the three counts of domestic assault and battery happened earlier this semester.

Chaunamom allegedly assaulted the victim on March 3 and April 1. The victim did not file the charges until the incident the first Sunday in April, police said.

The police, who were notified by the residents of the floor, conducted a brief investigation at the scene and arrested Chaunamom.

A pre–trial date has been set for April 27.

Demonstration on the Common defends Palestinian rights

By Syed Mohammed Ali Raza
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, a demonstration defending Palestinian human rights was held on the Amherst Common. It was the eighth annual vigil and was sponsored by the Jewish Committee on the Middle East and the Amherst friends of Gaza.

News Analysis

The chief organizer of the event was Margaret Holt, a participant of all eight vigils held so far. April marks the seventh year of the "intifada" (Palestinian uprising) a heroic struggle for the liberation of the Palestinian people. The demonstrators held placards demanding various actions against the Israeli settlers and government.

A handout published by the Jewish Committee on the Middle East was distributed at the demonstration. According to the handout, the Israelis want to "continue occupying the Palestinians," using the concept of "autonomy" to pretend otherwise.

The leaflet also stated that they want "others" to pay for that "autonomy" while they remain essentially in control and deny the Palestinians true statehood. It further commented that the peculiar Israeli variant of the Middle East apartheid continues, complete with secret police, pass laws, torture cells, restricted land ownership "laws," identity cards, military courts, assassination squads and many other forms of brutal suppression and discrimination.

This is regardless of the new rhetoric from Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres, which is clearly designed to pacify the world opinion while maintaining Israeli domination. Moreover, contrary to widespread propaganda, the Israelis have actually increased their military budget this year, have confiscated over two thirds of the territory of the West bank, and are still expanding settlements in the occupied territories.

The Committee stated that there are only two just choices available, and if the Israelis refuse to make a choice, U.S. assistance should be substantially cut back without any further delay.

The first option is for the Israelis to completely end their military occupation and accept Palestinian statehood in all of West bank, Gaza strip, and East Jerusalem, as required by the UN. This would include removing settlers from these areas; or else the apartheid–like system now imposed in the "occupied territories," and which surrounds Gaza with an electrified prison–like fence, must be ended. All people living in the area must have equal rights as equal citizens, just as in the U.S.

Professor Yoav Elinevsky, a veteran of the Israeli defense forces, stated that unless steps are taken in the right direction, the situation in the Middle East could become very explosive.

Volunteers sweat to fight AIDS

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students and area residents sweated and strutted to help in the fight against AIDS at a fundraiser this weekend.

The Workout for Hope, is an event held annually, during which people do aerobics in return for pledges, was held at Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton.

Approximately 110 participated, many involved with the six athletic clubs which alternately led the crowd in a series of aerobic routines.

"If you're into aerobics," said Larry Kelly, a co–chairman of the event, "there's no better place to be."

Larry and his wife Donna are the co–chairs of the Workout for Hope. They are also part owners of the Amherst Athletic Club.

Since its' inception, the Workout for Hope has grown from taking place in only a handful of cities in 1989, to 80 cities this year.

In its seven years of existence the Workout for Hope has raised $7 million. This year's national goal is $1.7 million.

The local goal for this year's workout was in the vicinity of $13,000, said Kelly.

According to Nancy Paris, who worked at the event, the amount received was a somewhat disappointing $9,000. She said, however, "... anything in the vicinity of $10,000 is considered a success."

"It costs at least $45 a day to do aerobics in New York," said Kelly, who explained that no one is even allowed to take the floor without raising $50.

Three hours of sweat

This is the Workout's third year in the Amherst–Northampton area, and it's seventh overall.

The event kicked off at noon with Jeff Martin, a world famous aerobics instructor and former pupil of Austin Adams, an even more famous New York instructor. He energized the crowd and led the participants in warm up exercises.

All the aerobicizers then proceeded to sweat and "work it" for the next three hours.

The crowd of exercisers was organized as a team taught by the best aerobics instructors from the Valley. Each instructor or group of instructors lead routines for 20–minute intervals.

Motivated by victim's energy

During the 1980s, few names were bigger in New York City aerobics than Austin Adams.

Adams was on the verge of going on to national fame in the early 1990s, when AIDS cut his career tragically short.

Before his death, though, he helped to coordinate a fundraiser in conjunction with the City of Hope Foundation to help combat the spread of AIDS. It was named the Workout for Hope.

And in entered Donna Kelly, who went to New York around this time to get involved in and learn from the city's aerobic scene.

It was here she met Austin, around the time that the virus began to take its toll. When he died, she vowed to get involved in the fight against AIDS.

"His energy really motivated me," she said, and went on to help make the Workout for Hope a success in the Valley right up to this year's event.

but this only made her more determined to succeed. In order to do so, she had given up her culture and traditions.

Climaxing the symbolism and the meaning behind the humor, Doña Geno exclaimed, "What good is it to succeed if you have to give up who you are?"

To be sure, many Latinos find themselves in this tight spot. Often, they have been confronted with choosing between maintaining their culture and traditions and going along with the status quo. Botánica exposes this common dilemma humorously yet in a way that is historically accurate.

The play, in fact, is an invitation for all Latinos to reaffirm their cultural origins without having to hold back any aspect of their individuality. "No hay que dejar que nos maten los bufalos, [we mustn't let them kill our buffaloes]," said Pepe El Indio, the drunk man whose slurred words served more like prophecies. These buffaloes symbolize the ancestors and past traditions, that Latinos cannot forget, deny or try to hide.

Bonds issued for UMass renovations

By Matthew Wurtzel
Collegian Staff

As the campuses of the University of Massachusetts slowly crumble, the University issued bonds on Tuesday afternoon for badly needed renovations.

The University is issuing a $22.6 million bond which will mature in 20 years. The Amherst campus will receive about $7.9 million of the funds said Bill Rose, associate vice chancellor for campus services.

"It is a stop gap measure in anticipation of a larger differed maintenance and capital program," Rose said.

The funds will be used exclusively for emergency maintenance projects to improve steam, heating, and electrical systems as well as meeting safety codes.

Rose said some work will begin immediately, but the majority of funds will be used through out the next three years.

The Amherst campus received a larger appropriation of funds because the campus is larger. Rose said the $7.9 million is nearly a third of the $22.6 million.

"Normally what happens at a bond issue is a public bid," said Claire G. Cohen, vice chairwoman at Fitch Investors Services. "They make an offer at various rates and the University chooses the lowest rate."

Various financial institutions placed bids for the bond on Tuesday afternoon, and the University chose Merrill Lynch.

The interest rate on the bond is 5.4 percent. Cohen said the University will repay the bond annually for the next 20 years, starting in 1996 at $630,000 and ending in 2015 at about $8.4 million.

The bond is callable on May 1, 2005 at 102 percent. Cohen said callable means the University can call the bond back prematurely and repay all the principle still due plus two percent interest.

The bond received an A+ rating from Fitch Investors Services. Cohen said an A+ is a good rating, but not the best.

The best rating a bond can receive is a AAA, which means it is the safest investment in the market. The next best is a AA, and the third safest investment is an A.

Bonds rated either AA or A are assigned a plus or a minus to give a better understanding of where they lie on the spectrum of safety. A plus means they are the best within the designated group while a negative would be at the lower end.

Cohen said that the University's bond rating is equal to the Commonwealth's bond rating.

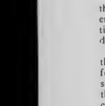
Trying to save the art of words

"You know, Em, I really feel you outta rethink this journalism career idea," my father recently said to me. "Nobody reads anymore."

In my 17-year academic career, I have never seriously considered what I wanted to be when I "grew up." I just knew that I liked to write.

"Well, Dad, I'm not sure that I want to go into journalism, anyway," I replied, questioning, for the first time, the role that writing would play in my future.

I used to think that my love of literature was won through process of default. Math and sciences always seemed like intangible, cryptic webs of information that had little to do with the world around me.



As I got older, my relationship (and I use this word loosely) with atoms, elements, formulas and numbers improved only slightly, though I became wise to the fact that math and science were more significant than I wanted to believe. I also found more outlets to do what I truly enjoyed in school — read and write.

High school was, for many people I knew, a scramble to get involved in as many activities as would fit on a college application. With a literary magazine, school newspaper, and yearbook, it was also a haven for wannabe writers to finally have a readership larger than a 20-person English class. I wrote and edited for our tiny monthly paper, realizing for the first time what it felt like to let hundreds of people inside my head, without the possibility of knowing just how my words affected them.

The first thing they tell you when you get to UMass is that you can get a lot out of this university, but you have to go out and get it for yourself. With all of the publications on campus and throughout the Five College area, I knew that this was a place where I could pursue writing.

Anyone who has ever slouched into the Collegian newsroom with a desire to write has experienced the same anxious intimidation. When you see your name in print for the first time, a combination of fear and pride washes over you. On one hand, you see your story — the story that you constructed from bits of information, quotes and observations.

On the other hand, you are responsible for every letter in the article, including the mistakes that may inspire any number of readers to call or write in, just to make sure you realize how ignorant you are.

Though I have written in various ways at UMass, I don't think I ever told myself that I wanted to be a writer. Some people at this school identify themselves as engineers, accountants, art historians, biologists, or psychologists. I don't think I have ever heard a student answer the inevitable what-are-you-going-to-do-with-your-life question with, "I am going to be a writer."

Writing, for me, is not a career choice nor a source of identification. It is also a very broad word to translate into a paycheck. Writers can be advertisers, teachers, free-lancers, reporters, critics, poets, playwrights, lyricists, publishers, editors, public relation gurus, screenplay creators, novelists, magazine contributors, researchers, fact-checkers, professors, or any other kind of "professional" who uses the written word to attain goals in the field.

When you think about it, writing is a necessary part of our everyday lives. We write each other letters, take down phone messages for our roommates, take notes on what we read, and write essays and term papers for class. Some of us write to work stuff out in our minds, either in journals, verses of poetry, or lyrics to songs that may never be heard.

In light of all the ways that writing is important, I wonder how my father could possibly be right about our society becoming less and less literary as time progresses. I think about my friends and classmates, most of whom are majoring in fields related to literature, and I know that they read the papers and magazines regularly. I walk through the Campus Center and see students reading the Collegian and other Valley publications.

Then I think about all the people who have told me they only read the comics and horoscopes in the paper. I think about so many students who dread reading for class, who prefer the mundane antics of television sitcoms to a juicy novel, and who do not realize that reading can be a source of entertainment and stimulation.

Those of you who have taken the time to read through this much of this column may be disturbed by the reality that reading and writing are becoming obsolete as our country moves toward the 21st century, via the information highway. The only solution I can see is to keep doing both of these things.

As far as my "career" goes, I think that no matter what I do to make a living, writing will be part of that life. Regarding what my father said about nobody reading these days, well, that's up to you.

Museum pieces trapped behind glass

"It's getting dark," said Eustacia Fields, as she moved to turn on the light.

"Leave it off," said Kent O'Brien, who was slumped in a butterfly chair in the corner of his room. The dim light from the fading sky filtered in through the blinds and covered the room in a blue shadow.

"I wish you'd stop drinking," said Eustacia.

"Yeah."

"You're not listening to me."

"That's a funny thing to say," he said, filling his glass with whiskey.

"You're not being fair. I can't stay here forever. Nobody can just stay here forever, Kent."

"Why? Where else is there to go?"

"You know damn well where there is to go. Please stop playing games with me," she said, absently picking up a small piece of paper off the floor. "This isn't making me happy either."

Kent swirled his glass. "Interesting how we do things that don't make us happy? Isn't it?"

"That's not what I mean."

"Would you like a drink?"

Eustacia put her head in her hands. The soft clinking of ice on glass reflected off the walls. The glare of the digital clock began to cast a red hue over the desk, making the papers in front of it seem part of a museum display at night. Stuck behind glass under the protective lights, watched by the patient footsteps of watchmen.

"It is something I have to do for myself," said Eustacia, folding the paper into a small triangle. "Things must mean more for me before they can mean more for us."

"What if that's all somebody has?"

"Then I feel sorry for them."

"It must be nice to be so strong as you," he said. "Without the need for all of us peons taking care of you. Have I served you well, dear?"

"Don't be that way. You have more than that to offer."

"Yeah."

"Why do you want me to sacrifice all of this?" she said, holding her hands in front of her, dropping the paper triangle. "Who are you to keep me here?"

The ice clinked again. "I don't know. Who am I?"

Eustacia sighed. "I wish you weren't drinking. I can't talk to you when you drink, Kent."

"But the world is so much clearer when it is blurred."

"You are acting like an ass."

"Well, at least I am something."

The light began to die to black, leaving only the faint glow of the streetlight outside to highlight Eustacia as she sat by the window. Kent seemed like a pile of old clothes stacked on the chair, with a cat crawling around on top, making them wrinkle and sway. Silence draped over the room, as Kent held his glass between his legs, and the ice had melted. Cars drove by outside, approaching and fading away into the distance.

The phone started ringing in the kitchen.

"Are you going to answer the phone?" asked Eustacia.

"Who is it?"

"How should I know?"

"Well, forget it then. If they want to see me, they'll come over."

The phone rang again.

"What's the matter with you, Kent?"

"I think it has something to do with me."

"You aren't making any sense."

"I'm drunk, remember? It all makes sense up here," he said, motioning to his head.

The phone rang again.

"Please talk to me."

"I am talking to you."

"I wish that everything would be okay, but if I can't live with myself, then it'll all become so empty," she said, bowing her head. "It isn't you. I just have to have the time to make it right for me. Nobody has the time anymore."

"It's eight-thirty."

The phone rang again.

"I'm sorry, Kent."

Seconds passed, and the phone did not continue. On the window, the soft tap of rain began to massage the air. Kent turned to look through the glass, but the metal blinds and the drops of water had turned the view into simply the glaring distortions of headlights as they passed by. Inside the room there was only the continuing red glow of the clock, which lacked even the power of a methodical ticking as a reminder of the passing of time. The rustle of clothes soon became harsh in the quiet, and the memory of the phone grew ominous in its power to once again break the silence.

"It's raining out," said Kent, lifting up his bottle.

Violence is a tool of the weak

Andrew Trodden

This past weekend while returning from an evening uptown, my girlfriend was approached by three girls who claimed she had "flipped them off." Upon my girlfriend's insistence that she had done nothing of the sort, the three girls took to the childish ways of name-calling.

My girlfriend turned to walk away from the encounter, only to be grabbed from behind and thrown to the ground. Wisely she took off, running for her dorm just a short distance from there.

Three to one. Real fair odds. Unless your name is Bruce Lee, you're going to lose. She did the right thing by running, because if she had stayed and fought, not only would she have been beaten down, but she would have given into what the three women were looking for — a fight. Two wrongs do not make a right.

By fighting these girls she would have given them the satisfaction of thinking that they were more than what they really are — a few losers who have nothing better to do than pick a fight with someone walking all alone late at night.

What has society come to when people have to keep looking over their shoulders for fear of being assaulted? Violence occurs even on this campus, which would appear to been the surface to be relatively safe.

One almost comes to expect this sort of savage behavior out of men, but from women? Is this what feminists fought for and are still fighting for? The right to be more like men and pick fights and jump people? I don't think so.

In this day and age when violence against women is ever increasing, women have a tough enough time dealing with the fear of being assaulted or raped by a man, let alone having to compound that with the fear of being jumped by someone of the same sex. Had my girlfriend actually been assaulted by three men, this incident would have appeared much more serious. But why should it be looked upon any differently because it was three girls? It shouldn't. I don't care if it was three little green leprechauns attacking you with canes. Violence is still violence.

My girlfriend now has to live with the fear of crossing paths with these girls again. She's afraid to walk alone, to go outside at night, and even afraid to look at people the wrong way. Have we become a society in which, if you look at someone the wrong way, you could get beat up over it? I'm afraid it has, and I'm almost ashamed to say that I live in a society that cannot live in peace. Or maybe I'm not ashamed to say it, but afraid. After all, I might get jumped for saying it; especially if I say it the wrong way.

We are all equal. No one person is better than another, and no three people are better than one person. Though three may be able to issue a hearty beating to one person, it doesn't make them any better. We all have the power to do bad and all have the power to do good. If there is any measure of greatness on this earth, it will be measured by which one of the two you choose, and how far you choose to take it.

Until the day that I truthfully see that good has overpowered evil, I, as a God-fearing American citizen, can honestly say that God will not be the only thing that I am afraid of.

Letters to the Editor

Students sheltered from political reality

To the editor:

Most of UMass, in fact most of the country, is politically in the dark. On April 5, Richard Gilluly wrote a column about the Republicans trying to help the rich and punish the poor with their Contract With America. His op/ed is well worth reading.

But judging from the campaigning against the Contract that I have been involved in, most people either haven't heard of it or don't know what it is. Richard's column made the Republican agenda quite clear. They aim to make the rich richer, the poor poorer, and to wrest rights from women, blacks, gays, and lesbians. The scary thing is, they are succeeding because we aren't paying attention.

UMass students; indeed the general public, don't know or don't care. And of course, this helps the Republicans greatly, because if you knew what they are trying to do this country that we supposedly run and pay for, you might be very angry and you might even try to stop them. Our ignorance and apathy works to their advantage. They've got us right where they want us. Sitting in front of the TV, watching some brain-draining program that is really only on to gather an audience for the commercials.

Not only does that help large companies sell us products that we really don't need, it also takes our attention away from the horrid inequality of wealth distribution in this country that is only getting worse. It is no coincidence that these large corporations are the only ones who will benefit from this Contract On Us. You could look away and pretend that this all doesn't apply to you, but the white-collar jobs you are in school to get, while you ignore political issues, won't be out there when you graduate (any economist will tell you this.)

Voter turnout for the Congressional elections was roughly 37 percent. Oh that, only 51 percent voted Republican (not exactly a landslide.) This means that less that 20 percent of the population voted for a Republican, and exit polls show that a significant portion of the Republican vote was against lousy Democrats, not for Republicans, and certainly not for the Contract.

So stop sitting around! Turn off your TV and get involved. You don't have to devote your life to political activism (although it would help,) but at least read the newspapers. Find out what is going on and how it will affect you. Or just tune-out and ignore politics. Pretend that it will just go away. Sorry, it won't!

Support for survey questioned

To the editor:

I want to clarify the misrepresentation of what I had said during the meeting at the Chancellor's Office as it was reported in the Collegian on April 4.

I have never questioned Sue Pearson's personal support for issues concerning childcare. Sue Pearson is a working mother who knows first-hand the difficulties of combining career and family life within this University and is doing what she can to help push this issue on campus.

What I do question, which is the issue I raised with Chancellor Scott, is the University's commitment to this project. I was in a state of shock to hear our Chancellor take credit for the University wide childcare survey — a project that I initiated and worked closely on for two years. How can I honestly believe that Chancellor Scott is sincerely committed to assessing the family needs of university employees and students when the Chancellor's Office refused to write the letter announcing and supporting the survey to the University Community?

It is also difficult for me to believe the sincerity of his commitment to this issue given that they survey was distributed in a very unsystematic way. Basically, when it came to two days before the survey was targeted to be distributed, the Graduate Employee Organization had to round up six or seven volunteers to donate their personal labor so that this project would happen. I am sure that there are still many employees and students who have families have no idea about this survey because the survey never reached them!

Cecilia Rio
GEO Childcare Coordinator

University must address childcare

To the editor:

I was disappointed to learn from the Collegian and GEO that the Faculty Senate made time to consider admission standards and discuss waste management at the April 6 meeting, but could not spare three minutes to hear the testimony of a female student whose struggle to find child care nearly made her withdraw form the University.

Child care is of vital interest to undergraduates and graduate students with children. Without accessible, affordable, dependable child care, women with children are at a severe disadvantage as students. I would think this would be of concern to the faculty at UMass, considering their expressed commitment to multicultural diversity in the classroom. Difficulty obtaining child care can make undergraduates habitually late for class and create conflicts for graduate students who must choose between their TA responsibilities and their children. Without affordable child care, many women who want to attend classes cannot even consider enrollment in the first place, or must reluctantly drop out of school.

While all mothers are affected, poor single mothers experience the most difficulty attending classes and continuing their education. Affordable on-site child care may be the single most important factor in a mother's decision to continue her education. If women's higher education matters, if poor mothers and the future of their families matter, child care must become a priority on University organization agendas.

QUICK, FAST, IN A HURRY
Guzzard
Amphetamine Reptile

Every now and then a band comes along whose sound is so utterly new and original that it defies description and simply leaves your head spinning.

Guzzard is not that band.

Nonetheless, what they do, they do very well. That is, they play honest, hard-hitting American hardcore with just enough sonic digression to keep things interesting.

On their aptly-titled second album, Quick, Fast, In A Hurry, this Minncapolis trio takes the metal-core precision of former labelmates Helmet and propels it at punk rock velocity while singer/guitarist Tom Beeman delivers a barrage of maladjusted lyrics in his best Bob Mould–meets– Jello Biafra–meets–David Yow.

What really sets Guzzard apart from most of their post– Husker Du contemporaries, however, is their unexpected sense of melody. Although far from commercial–sounding, Guzzard manage to insert pop hooks in all the right places, especially on the playground injustice anthem "Sebastian's Revenge."

After tearing through such spiteful numbers as "Sixed" and "Steeples" at break–neck speeds, the band slows things down a bit with the more subtle, melodically rambling instrumental "Hiro" (named after their biggest Japanese fan).

The album's final track, "Death Race 2000" serves as a fitting overview of Guzzard's sound, maneuvering skillfully between a driving groove and bursts of calculated dissonance.

For those who think that the Twin Cities music scene began with Husker Du and ended with Prince, Guzzard is a powerful reminder that nothing could be farther from the truth. B+ (Matthew Justin Faerber)

Me Against the World
Interscope

Tupac Shakur is, of course, more famous for his media than his music, and furthermore has threatened that, with his enforced incarceration, this album may serve as an epitaph to his rapping career.

On Me Against the World, the ambiguous "Intro," comprised of news soundbites, may be seen as a narcissistic celebration of the self, or as a self–explanatory indictment of a white corporate media's revelry in the supposedly self– destructive rise and fall of a successful black man.

The album itself opens with the peculiarly tepid "If I Die 2Nite," which nevertheless ironically recognizes the mortality of the man, as opposed to the media–manufactured monster. The self–defensive stance does not stultify the creativity, the title track juxtaposing swooning female harmonies with a furious contribution by Dramacydal.

The collaborations and samples are effective, notably Lady Levi dynamically interpolating on "Heavy in the Game." Tupac's awareness of his success owing much to the pioneers of the past is stylishly acknowledged on "Old School," though it is disorienting to consider De La Soul as Daisy Aged when it seems like just yesteryear . . .

If the title track seems to suggest paranoiac tendencies, consider Tupac's astonishing acquaintance with near death. As he recently asserted, "I'm not a gangsta rapper. I rap about things that happen to me. I got shot five times, you know what I'm saying."

Unfortunately, Tupac's reformist message, as professed on "Young Niggaz" and "It Ain't Easy" sometimes lacks the musical muscle of the more misogynist Snoop Doggy Dogg (an exchange between Tupac and a young black boy on "Outlaw" seems to be a poignant parody of an equivalent scene between Snoop and a wannabe gangsta on Doggy Style).

Of course, the cause of Tupac's conviction, allegedly condoning the gang rape of a girl by his crew, sits uneasily with the pro–feminist posturing of earlier songs like "Brenda's Got A Baby" and "I Get Around," but his problems allow him to address an oddly emotive paean to the irreplacable woman in his life on "Dear Mama."

Despite the cloying sentimentality of the tune and the potential pitfall of TUPAC SHAKUR! apologizing to his mummy, the realization that she was a single black welfare mother adds several dimensions to not just the song but

Brando reigns over Don Juan

Romantic comedy tries too hard; performances redeem

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

DON JUAN DEMARCO
Directed by Jeremy Leven
With Marlon Brando, Johnny Depp
Playing at Hompshire Six Theaters

One of the many pleasures of Don Juan DeMarco is finding out that Marlon Brando can still act. And this isn't faint praise — unlike say, a rickety Katharine Hepburn in Love Affair, Brando isn't merely not embarrassing, but actually quite good. The movie is smart enough to break the ice when we first see the immense girth of Brando. Remarking to a considerably thinner co–worker that the man has put on a little weight, he replies, "I think we're going to the same bakery." Laughs all around, thank you, now on with the movie.

It's this genially self–conscious charm that propels Don Juan, a gentle romantic comedy that seems to travel in the same vein as The Princess Bride, but with considerably more ambiguity. It's nice to see a movie where people like each other for a change, where the stakes — like love, honor and identity — are dealt with as assertively old–fashioned notions, bound to the myth–making territory of the movies. And finally, even if it tries too hard to be romantic and satiric at the same time, it's nice for a movie to try at all these days.

Brando plays Jack, a retiring psychiatrist called to talk down a potential suicide, a man (Johnny Depp) who claims he's the legendary lover Don Juan. Taken into custody, Depp charms the female staff of the hospital and connects with Jack. As Don Juan spins the tales of his life, Jack is smitten too, enough to want to spice up his long marriage to his wife (Faye Dunaway). Jack must then decide if Depp is really Don Juan or a delusional nut case — and not really sure if he wants to find out either way.

Though it's no doubt a thin plot to hang a movie on, Don Juan seems more interested in trying to make the audience swoon. It's a pleasurable conceit, and you're with the movie for making this choice. But while it makes for a nifty enough diversion, it's not entirely successful. By using self– mocking humor or just an abrupt cut to end every scene, the film keeps undercutting itself. It's afraid to take itself seriously for one moment — wary of us seeing its true romantic soul (it wants to keep us in on the joke instead).

It's a fast paced film — too fast — and you wish it would stop and smell the roses for a minute; indulge in the same dreamy advice it keeps telling its characters to. In one scene, for example, Brando asks the (underused) Dunaway what her hopes and dreams are. Tearing up, Dunaway tells him she thought he'd never ask . . . and then the film quickly and frustratingly moves on to another scene entirely. The resolution, thick with ambivalence comes on like whiplash, and you may need a few moments to play catch–up while the credits are rolling.

Yet it's nice to see Brando is still a, uh, force — and not just because of his size. There's a ruminating regret that's all over his performance, coupled with a cleverness that's always been inside of him, peeking out. There's a moment when the camera lingers on a old photo of Brando — when he was taut, sinewy, vulnerable — that, when dissolved into a current close up, speaks volumes. He matches all of Depp's comparatively naive rhythms with a currency all his own, and it's less a passing of the torch than a reciprocatory tip of the hat.

As Don Juan, Depp has got the seductive thing down like never before, working his teen dream–boat status (which, despite taking every quirky role on the planet, he still hasn't entirely lost) with a more grown–up masculinity. Like all of Depp's performances, it's an interesting contortion to watch, but it's not terribly compelling, and you get the feeling that Depp will never be terribly compelling, always running from "21 Jump Street" (Edward Scissorhands came the closest).

And finally, a plea for Faye Dunaway. Now relegated to glorified cameos in projects like Don Juan, vamping in B– movie trash like The Temp or Tom Petty videos, it's hard to remember Dunaway was one of America's top actresses of the late '60s and '70s, culminating in her performance in the criminally underrated 1981 film Mommie Dearest. (Stop groaning — I keep telling people Dunaway's riff on Joan Crawford was one of the bravest, most fearless performances of the '80s, right next to De Niro in Raging Bull. They think I'm kidding.)

While it's certainly not a chore watching Don Juan, it's a bit too much of an effort for a sunny, romantic comedy. But there's plenty of good stuff here — Brando, Depp, Dunaway, for starters — that makes it worth the extra work. The identity crisis may have to do more with the movie than its plot, but valentines like this don't come this way that often ... you take what you can get. B

MAD SEASON
Above
Columbia

While some believe that Seattle is now too popular to be cool, the scene itself is probably still the most important around. With a community of bands that have gotten together to produce one-off side projects like Temple of the Dog, Monkeywrench, Brad and Hater, the Seattle scene is bringing back fun to what is now called an industry.

The latest Seattle supergroup is Mad Season, a band featuring Layne Staley of Alice in Chains, Mike McCready of Pearl Jam, Barrett Martin of Screaming Trees and the little known John Baker Saunders. The result of their union is Above.

Recorded in a matter of weeks, Above is a loose and seemingly unfinished but, nonetheless, impressive debut. Staley and McCreadys' presence are unquestionable, from Staley's moody, introspective lyrics to McCready's wah- drenched leads, but it's Barrett Martin, who goes beyond his drumming duties to quietly showcase his abilities. From tribal percussion, upright bass, cello, marimba, and vibes, Martin adds a little flavor to an otherwise typical hard rock, blues-based album.

The album has its moments, though. "Wake Up" is a moody blues number with a hint of Staley optimism while "River of Deceit" gives way to McCready's country stylings. Oddly enough, the two standout tracks, "Long Gone Day" and "I'm Above," were co-written by Screaming Trees frontman Mark Lanegan, which questions the song-writing skills of the band, itself.

Above is a little rough around the edges but, it seems the idea was just to be free and not worry about turning in a polished product. Unfortunately, it fails to have the chemistry of the members' respective bands. C+ (Wayken Shaw)

Miracle root is cure-all, earns $50M in midwest

By Pat Robbins
Associated Press

It's said to pep you up, calm you down and cure everything from indigestion to infertility. It's ginseng, a small plant that's big business.

Last year, the American farm-grown variety of the aromatic root brought nearly $50 million into Wisconsin, where it is a leading cash crop.

Ginseng's mystique dates back at least 5,000 years. Chinese Emperor Shen-ung praised its healing powers in a book on herbal medicine. The emperor, who claimed ginseng could prolong life, supposedly died at age 123 in 2697 B.C.

Over the centuries, ginseng has been used as a general tonic and as a treatment for headaches, stomach ailments, asthma, fevers, coughs, rheumatism and a host of other ills. But its effectiveness never has been proved to American physicians and pharmacists.

"The folkloric attributes of ginseng are based on anecdotal evidence," says Varro Tyler, professor of pharmacognosy — the science dealing with medicines made from natural substances — at Purdue University.

"There have been animal tests in other countries that seem promising. But we won't really know what ginseng can or cannot do until someone does full-scale clinical studies here, and those cost about $350 million."

In Asia, where herbal medicine is widely practiced, ginseng has a prominent place on pharmacy shelves. Athletes use it to improve performance. Soviet cosmonauts have swallowed it in space. Stressed-out urbanites say it has a calming effect and helps them sleep.

Because the root sometimes grows in a crude human shape, it has been called "human root" or "man root" and has gained fame as an aphrodisiac. Roots with definite human forms still bring the highest prices, sometimes thousands of dollars.

"The aphrodisiac effect is probably the best-known and least-proven effect of ginseng," says Robert McCaleb, president of the Herb Research Foundation in Boulder, Colo., which follows developments in herbal medicine.

McCaleb takes a middle position on ginseng. "I respect the knowledge gained over 5,000 years by careful observation," he tells National Geographic. "There is some evidence that ginseng enhances physical and mental performance, reduces fat in the blood and stimulates the immune system."

The twisted, wrinkled root comes from a knee-high woodland plant found in parts of Asia and eastern North America. The two main species are Chinese ginseng and North American ginseng.

Eighteenth-century missionaries to China heard about the wonders of ginseng and described it to their brothers in the New World. When Jesuits found it growing in Canada in 1714, a flourishing East-West trade began.

Bob Mould performs new, classic material

By Mike Burke
Collegian Staff

BOB MOULD
Pearl Street
April 6

NORTHAMPTON — Last Thursday, punk legend Bob Mould returned to the Valley and performed a mostly acoustic set to a crowded Pearl Street nightclub.

A year and a half ago, Mould brought his talents to Amherst College where he played songs mostly by his current band, Sugar. At last Thursday's show, Mould kept pulling up treat after treat from his solo material and from his days with the legendary Husker Du.

Dressed in a simple striped shirt and worn out jeans, Mould took the stage with his two guitars and some bottled water. That would be all he needed to electrify the crowd with over an hour of music.

The opening tune "Wishing Well," an old single from his first solo album, set the pace for the rest of the night. Among the other songs included in the set were the crowd favorite "Brasilia Crossed with Trenton" and "Poison Years."

Probably the most surprising part of Mould's set was the few Sugar songs he played. Without a doubt, Sugar has established Mould as one of the most important figures in rock music today. Although Husker Du may have been more influential, Sugar has been his vehicle for success. Almost everyone in the crowd knew the Sugar tunes by heart, but a large part was left in the dark when Mould performed his older material.

Unfortunately for these newer Mould fans, his set seemed to be almost all older material. Among the Sugar tunes he played were "Hoover Dam," "Slick," and "Your Favorite Thing," all of which are mediocre songs at best.

Fortunately he did perform "Can't Help You Anymore" one of the best songs off Sugar's latest album, File Under Easy Listening, and "Needle Hits E" an obscure B-side that deserves more exposure.

The highlight of the set was his medley which combined the Sugar tune "Explode and Make Up" and the Husker Du song "Hardly Getting Over It." The die-hard Mould fans were thrilled to hear Mould perform other Husker Du classics such as "No Reservations" and "Celebrated Summer."

For the encore, Mould plugged in his electric guitar to perform "Slick" and "Makes No Sense At All" the almost hit single that Husker Du never really had.

At times, his acoustic versions fell short of the originals but, over all, these new interpretations brought out some of the more interesting aspects of songs that were originally drowned in noisy feedback.

Mould more than proved why he must be considered one of the best songwriters alive and should be held in the highest esteem. Few artists have had such an essential role in shaping the music world over the last 15 years. It is ironic that bands such as Green Day, who owe an arm and a leg to Mould, are now playing arenas while Mould is still touring the club scene. Then again, he probably prefers it this way.

Diminishing box office revenues reflect bad films

By John Horn
Associated Press

PASADENA, Calif. — Here's one way to see how poorly today's movies are performing: Duck into a local theater. At a prime-time showing of Tank Girl four days after its debut, a total of two people bought tickets.

This United Artists adaptation of a futuristic comic book, which earned a pitiful $2 million in its debut weekend, isn't the only new movie that's bombing. March admissions were the worst of the '90s, and Hollywood can't wait for summer — and its big-budgeted blockbusters — to arrive.

Only two recent movies — Warner Bros.' Outbreak and Paramount's The Brady Bunch Movie — have done moderately well at the ticket window so far this year.

The new Warner Bros. gorilla movie Born to Be Wild played worse than Tank Girl, bringing in $1.7 million its first weekend. Other recent washouts include Fox's Bye Bye, Love; Disney's Tall Tale: The Unbelievable Adventures of Pecos Bill, Roommates and Heavyweights; Paramount's Losing Isaiah, and TriStar's Hideaway.

North American ticket sales for March were $301.3 million, a five-year low and an 11 percent decrease from last March. Year-to-date revenues are $957 million, down more than 10 percent from last year's $1.07 billion. The slump looks even worse when slightly higher ticket prices are factored in.

"I don't think it's the economy. I don't think it's the weather. In fact, there's no baseball, so business should be even better than it is," says Mitch Goldman, whose New Line Cinema is banking on its Don Juan De Marco to catch on after its Friday debut. The company's The Mangler disappeared days after its March 3 premiere.

Studio executives have looked everywhere to explain the anemic business. The answer always comes back home: They're making bad movies.

Specifically, Hollywood is making bad, cheap movies. The films aren't simply poorly plotted and acted, they look bad, too. Most of the failing movies are aimed at narrow audiences — the bloody horror flick, the flatulence joke comedy, the action-adventure macho movie.

A few of these "niche" releases have connected with a small audience. Every Chris Farley fan, for example, will probably see Tommy Boy. That's not a lot of people, though.

Tommy Boy opened last weekend in 2,165 theaters and took in $8 million. Meanwhile, the critically acclaimed Irish movie Circle of Friends, a romantic comedy aimed at young women, is playing in a mere 339 theaters and has earned almost $5 million in three weeks.

Another bittersweet comedy that also won raves from critics is the Australian movie Muriel's Wedding. It, too, is in limited release and has made $7.1 million in four weeks.

And then there are niche movies that seem to have no niche. Like 1994's The Mask, Tank Girl is based on an obscure comic book. The Mask had Jim Carrey and eye-popping special effects. Tank Girl, a kind of female Road Warrior movie, has ... Lori Petty.

Barry London, the distribution chief at Paramount Pictures where Tommy Boy was made, says another part of the problem is that top Academy Award-winner Forrest Gump already has earned most of its gross. Last year, many people had not seen Schindler's List before it triumphed at the Academy Awards.

Theater piece explores plights of Latino family

By Yinan Estrada
Collegian Correspondent

BOTÁNICA
Bowker Auditorium
April 8

"Todo es la misma cosa [everything is the same], I decide what it means to be from here," said Milagros, one of the key characters in Dolores Prida's play Botánica.

Dealing with issues deeply ingrained in the migrating Latino communities of the United States, the play exposes generational conflicts among Latinas and problems of acculturation.

Without a doubt, Botánica's strength lies in Prida's ability to utilize humor in presenting issues of great importance to the Latino community and Repertorio Español's talented crew. The play explores generational and cultural conflicts between an older woman, her daughter and granddaughter, an Ivy League university graduate.

The older woman, Doña Geno, owns and runs a botánica, a business dealing with herbs, spells and spiritual values. She and her daughter expect the granddaughter, Milagros, to take over the business. Milagros, who, after attending college has been exposed to a "different world," has other plans after graduation.

The play takes place at Doña Geno's botánica "La Ceiba." Anamú, Doña Geno's daughter, is preparing fifty "pasteles" (a typical Puerto Rican dish) to bring to Milagro's graduation. While Anamú and Doña Geno expect Milagros' call announcing the exact date of the graduation ceremony, she shows up at home unexpectedly, saying the ceremony had already taken place and that she was unable to call.

Milagros, who now demands to be called "Millie," explains that since she was young she wanted to be like the "other kids," and having her mother and grandmother present at the ceremony would have singled her out once again.

While her family and neighbors expect her to take over the botánica, Milagros expects to eventually become "vice- president of the Chase Manhatten Bank downtown," which recruited her from college. "Millie" wants to "make it out there in the real world."

Doña Geno is suffering from health problems and her daughter Anamú is very concerned because "Millie" won't change her mind about taking over the shop. Doña Geno wants to teach her granddaughter her secret recipes but "Millie" responds that she doesn't believe in that "mumbo- jumbo." Doña Geno faints, and the next thing we know is that she is in the hospital. In a conversation with Rubén, a close friend of the family, "Millie" confesses that she feels responsible for what happened and later on makes "a deal" with the saints, asking them to heal her grandmother.

"Millie" tells Rubén that she doesn't feel she has anything to do with the old traditions and beliefs. She is "from here" not "from there" meaning that she is from the United States not from Puerto Rico, because she was born and raised in New York. Back in college, she had to adapt to a new atmosphere where people were not accepting of her. Peers made fun of her and played bad jokes.

Women's lax splits two weekend games

By Allison Cannolly and Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (2-4) began its only consecutive home games of the season Saturday against Villanova. Cold rain and snow was the order of the day, as the elements proved to be typically New England, worsening through the course of the game and the game as the Minutewomen lost, 10-7.

The snowy conditions could have played a factor, because the team's passing game was just a bit off the whole day. According to freshmen attacker Joanna Dignazio and defender Erica Bryan, though, the team was to blame for the lack of consistency.

"The conditions were not a factor, and it should not have been," Dignazio said. "We just broke down and did not play well as a team at all."

"For the team, it was obvious that our passes were not connecting," Bryan said. "Both from the defense to the offensive side of the field."

The Minutewomen started off fast early, using their offense patiently to the point when Bryan scored her first goal of the year at 28:02. The quick start continued less than a minute later. Freshman attacker Kristin Kramer made it 2-0 with an assist from Dignazio. Good upfield passing was forcing Villanova to take quick fouls, but after two comeback goals, the game was tied eight minutes into the game.

For the rest of the period the teams traded goals, but with two minutes left, Villanova's sophomore attacker Shannon O'Neill scored, leaving UMass down 6-5 at the half. Kramer's second goal of the game at 20:34 in the second half tied the game, but after trading goals to make it 7-7, three unanswered goals sealed the fate for the Minutewomen.

Coach Francesca McClellan said that it was not weather or the negative result on the scoreboard that was the problem, but the team itself.

"Saturday's game was very disappointing," McClellan said. "Not necessarily because we lost, but because we did not play to what we are capable of."

The Minutewomen were validated with an impressive win over St. Joe's on Sunday. Teamwork and consistency were the keys to success and a final score of 19-6 for Massachusetts.

Freshman Jen Bowen had an outstanding game, scoring five goals (four in the first half) and one assist.

"Today we played like a team," Bowen said. "We really put it together. It was a great feeling and everyone trusted each other, it flowed so well."

According to McClellan, Villanova's game lacked the intensity and focus that this game had.

"It was clear that [Saturday] we were not following the game plan," McClellan said. "Your players might be scoring a lot of goals but if they're not working with everyone else, it takes more out of the game. Today we put in the players that could execute that plan."

The strongest advantage for the Minutewomen in this game was their passing skills which permeated the overwhelmed St Joe's defense.

"We have the team, we just had to have confidence in ourselves, especially in our passing," Bryan said. "It's all communication. When we talk, we know we're there to help each other, and play as a team. When we play as individuals, that's where our downfall is."

Bryan was instrumental in putting pressure on the ball and keeping the defense solid.

Dignazio netted three goals while freshman Vicky Nedomansky had three goals and two assists.

This game was also an opportunity for those players that have not seen regular playing time to show what their abilities. Sophomore Robin Axelrod exploded on the field, coming off the bench to net three goals and one assist.

"Robin is a player who started to absolutely standout in this game," McClellan said. "She has become an invaluable starter."

Sophomore goalie Trish DiBenedetto saw a substantial amount of time in the net, playing the entire second half. DiBenedetto made 15 saves and allowed only one goal. Freshman goalie Kate Brew also had a strong showing in net for the first half and making six saves.

game.

Massachusetts stayed on course after the leadoff hitter went to the plate, while Vermont strayed off. Behind Daut's (12-5) one hit shutout and the hitting barrage, the Minutewomen took the first game of the double header by a touchdown.

Cardenas scored on a Mareina single, while Marenia scored after consecutive singles by Buckley and Kim Guiridge. The Minutewomen led 2-0 after one inning.

Massachusetts then got runs in the third and fifth innings. The third inning run came on a Guiridge double, knocking in Buckley. The run in the fifth came on a Dorsey, who knocked in Buckley.

The Minutewomen then cushioned their lead with a three- run sixth inning, as Chris Martens and Buckley both slapped RBI singles.

Massachusetts 7, Vermont 3

The cold weather that struck Totman Field during the first game only got colder in the second game late yesterday afternoon. But the Massachusetts bats stayed hot, scoring another seven runs yesterday afternoon, and taking a four-run victory.

Ortega picked up the win on a four hitter, and improved her record to 7-6.

Vermont opened up the second game with two runs in the top of the first inning. Jen Boccaro hit a single, and drove in Kristen Briggs. A Jen Winslow groundout drove in Denise Brown, who reached base on a fielder's choice.

The Minutewomen immediately replied by scoring four runs of their own in the first. Buckley, Guiridge and Powell singled in respective runs to head the rally.

Infield injuries do not sink Minutemen

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

Mark Pileski did damage with his bat last Saturday at Earl Lorden Field, yet it was not at the plate as he would have liked.

Pileski, the junior shortstop for the University of Massachusetts baseball team, slipped on a bat during warm-ups prior to the first game of this weekend's series with Temple and twisted his ankle, leaving a gaping hole in the Minuteman line-ups, both offensively and defensively.

"I stepped on the bat and turned it," Pileski said. "It swelled up, but I've gone through some therapy and I'll take it day by day."

Pileski underwent X-rays on Saturday and his injury was classified as a slight sprain. He was planning to meet with the team doctors this morning to continue therapy; Pileski admitted that he could have played yesterday if he was needed.

Massachusetts coach Mike Stone, however, was forced to pull Pileski at the last minute before the series opener and insert sophomore David Giglio, who had only started four times this season, in his place.

He responded, getting a hit and scoring a run in Game 1; nailing a clutch single in Game 3 that started a five-run inning for the Minutemen, who completed the three-game sweep over the rival Temple Owls.

Pileski's was not the only injury Stone and Massachusetts had to deal with last weekend. Second baseman Muchie Dagliere injured his thigh a week ago and will be out for at least another week of action.

Sophomore Ryan Thistle started at second for the Minutemen and had a good series against Temple. He collected four hits, two RBIs and four runs scored while committing no errors.

"Those two guys [Giglio and Thistle] did a great job," Stone said. "Having both your second baseman and your shortstop out makes it tough, and it's nice to see them perform so well this weekend."

Despite the solid performances put forth by Giglio and Thistle, not everyone was satisfied. A scout from the Texas Rangers stopped by Lorden Field on Saturday to see Pileski and was disappointed when he heard of the shortstop's injury.

Injuries to Mark Pileski (above) and Muchie Dagliere have given David Giglio and Ryan Thistle a chance to start for UMass.

Gorrie hits a groove

With the injuries to Pileski and Dagliere, third baseman Brad Gorrie moved up from the ninth spot to the second spot in the batting order and shined against Temple. Along with his second HR of the season on Sunday, Gorrie went 4- for-9 with 3 RBIs and a stolen base.

Gorrie had entered the weekend only hitting .189 with six RBIs.

Pelis calls his shot — sort of Catcher Andy Pelis said before the first game in yesterday's doubleheader that he felt good and believed he would break out of a mini-slump. Truer words were never spoken as the Minuteman captain blasted a home run in his first at-bat, en route to a four-hit, three-RBI, three-run scored doubleheader.

"I can't try to overswing, that's when I won't get hits," Pelis said. "I felt like I would have a good day, and I did."

"Andy came up big with the biggest hit of the day," Stone said in reference to Pelis' run-scoring single in the bottom of the seventh that won the game for the Minutemen, 5-4.

"He's done a great job as a captain and a leader of this team for three years."

Jette blasting off

Leftfielder Ryan Jette continued on a tear in the sweep against Temple, collecting seven hits, four stolen bases, two RBIs and three runs scored. He is now batting .460, which leads the Minutemen, along with nine stolen bases.

The Minutemen return to action Wednesday at Rhode Island for an Atlantic 10 doubleheader. Game time is 1 p.m.

Shupak and Schwartz qualify

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

At the NCAA regionals, held at Penn State University this weekend, two Massachusetts men's gymnasts, Kevin Schwartz and Ruslan Shupak, posted scores that qualified them to continue on to the NCAA Men's Gymnastics Championships.

Both athletes will compete April 15 at Ohio State University and attempt to become national champions.

Schwartz scored a 9.85 on the still rings to qualify for the national finals.

The score Schwartz posted placed him third overall at the meet.

He has consistently scored in the 9.9 range all season and went into the competition ranked first in the country.

He had been ranked no lower than second nationally all season long.

The meet consisted of the top six individual competitors in each individual event, the top six all-around competitors as well as the top six teams in the Eastern Region.

Though Schwartz is only a freshman, his composure in the big meets during the season has been one of a upperclassman and he looks to continue his success next week.

Shupak, who had been ranked second in the country entering the regionals, continued his excellence in the vault scoring a 9.50 which qualified him to advance to the Nationals.

The sophomore made his second trip to the Regionals count.

Last year as a freshman he competed in the Regionals but came up just short of earning a trip to the Nationals.

Murphy from second base, giving the Minutemen a 5-4 win.

After Temple tied the game in the top of the seventh, Murphy led off Massachusetts' half with a single and advanced to second on a sacrifice bunt from Knight. An intentional walk to first baseman Jeff Michaels set the stage for Pelis and the Minuteman captain delivered with the knock up the middle for the game winner.

Chad Paronto (3-1) picked up the complete game victory, allowing nine hits and two earned runs for the Minutemen.

In the series finale, Massachusetts broke a 1-1 game open in the fourth inning and defeated the Owls, 9-4. Shortstop David Giglio, playing in place of an injured Mark Pileski, drove in Pelis with a base hit for a 2-1 advantage. Second baseman Ryan Thistle followed with a double, plating Giglio for a 3-1 lead.

Temple rallied in the late innings, but to no avail. Freshman Scott Barnsby picked up his third win.

Jose Canseco joins Red Sox camp

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — As Jose Canseco held court with a bleacher full of reporters, a lone microphone and camera put Roger Clemens' thoughts on the record.

"I guess it's going to be the world according to Jose now," infielder Tim Naehring joked, "instead of the world according to Roger."

Clemens eventually drew a crowd of his own. But the questions were all about Canseco, who went through his first practice with the Red Sox after reporting to spring training on Friday.

"I enjoy what he brings to our game," Clemens said when asked if he minded being pushed into the media shadows by his new teammate.

"He's a tremendous player, an exciting player. And there's only a good handful of guys like that around. ... When he walked into the clubhouse today, he definitely brought that with him."

Canseco drove across Florida from his home in Miami in the middle of the night so he could get to Fort Myers, check into his hotel, catch a quick breakfast at Denny's and still make the team's introductory meeting at 8 a.m.

"I can't say I grew up watching him, but through high school he was a big star," said 23-year-old outfielder Greg Blosser, who had never met Canseco before. "So, it's pretty exciting. But he's just one of the guys now."

Canseco stretched with his teammates, fouled a few off in the batting cage and then pronounced himself rusty.

"That's what happens when you don't pick up a bat for three months," he told the media horde that followed him everywhere.

When Canseco headed to the field for batting practice, the reporters had formed a friendly pool on how many swings it would take for him to hit one out.

He put the ninth pitch from coach Tim Johnson over the left field fence — and the three-story backstop on the practice field beyond.

"There's a scud," manager Kevin Kennedy said, as the crowd that gathered to see Canseco broke into applause.

"They've been waiting for this for a long time. Ever since we got him (in an off-season trade)," Clemens said. "And now they're seeing it come to formation."

Mo Vaughn, who will probably move to the cleanup spot to make room for Canseco at No. 3, knocked a couple the other way in what seemed to be a friendly competition.

Greenwell, who knows where he rates in such a contest, joked that he wanted to be put in a different hitting group.

But he, too, was glad to have Canseco on his side.

"I was excited when we got him," Greenwell said. "So was my 6-year-old. He was, like, 'Yeah, we got Jose.'"

Men's track captures tri-meet

By Justin C. Smith
Collegian Staff

Last season's tri-meet between the University of Massachusetts, Boston College and Boston University came down to the last event.

The Eagles came away with a victory by just four points over the Minutemen. With the teams fielding similar rosters, this meet looked to be one of similar proportions, but the Minutemen would have none of that.

The Minutemen jumped out to a quick lead in the snow at Llwelyn Derby Track, and cruised home with a resounding victory.

They grabbed a total of 91 points on the day, followed by Boston College (68) and Boston University (23).

"I was really surprised by the final score differential," Massachusetts coach Ken O'Brien said.

"We expected this meet to be just the same kind of one as we had last year.

"But we had a few pleasant surprises who tore some big points for us, as well as the performers we count on to score for us coming through once again."

UMass grabbed at least a first in every jumping event during the course of the afternoon.

Thomas Galligani

Senior Thomas Galligani continued his excellence in his events, winning both the long jump (20' 9-1/2") and the triple jump (42' 11-1/2"). His outstanding performance followed the announcement that he was once again selected to the All Academic A-10 Indoor Track Team.

Sophomore Ronald Tauro grabbed points for the Minutemen in three separate events as he finished second behind Galligani in the long jump after taking two firsts. Tauro ran to a victory in the high hurdles with a time of 15.4 seconds and cleared the high bar at 5' 9-1/4.

The other two event winner of the day for the Minutemen was junior Ethan Nedeau with wins in 1500m (4:02.9) and the 800m (1:55.8).

"We got off to a quick start and the guys really got into the meet," O'Brien added. "Once the guys got a feel for the meet and took those quick points we felt good about our chances. It was just a snowball effect and helped the guys in the later events."

O'Brien pointed to the two early first and second place finishes by the Minutemen in the pole vault and the long jump as the start of the chain reaction.

Senior Paul Doyle and junior Jim Leary cleared the height of 12' 1-3/4" in the pole vault. Galligani's winning long jump was followed up by freshman Jeff Brusso.

After the Massachusetts 4x100 relay team claimed a second place the Minutemen grabbed 3 more 1-2 finishes which put them in control of the meet.

Nedeau's performance in the 1500m was backed by a strong second place finish by sophomore Michael Maceiko who finished less than 4 seconds off the pace.

Tauro and Doyle claimed the points in the High Hurdles, then a bit of a surprise in the javelin. Junior Michael Masone won the event with a throw of 176' 1/2".

"The big points were in the first and second places in the javelin" O'Brien said.

"Masone and Lambert had two big throws for us. That was a key 1-2 finish for us. It was a bit of a surprise, but a pleasant one."

At this point, the Minutemen were leading by 30 points and were in control of the meet.

Other key contributors to the UMass victory were Craig Cormier in the 800m and Terrance O'Neil in the 400m hurdles.

The Minutemen (4-0-1) return to action this coming Saturday for their final home meet of the season as Holy Cross, Central Connecticut, Hartford, Providence and Iona travel to Llwelyn Derby Track.

and Michigan, the top two places in the A-10 were hers. Tolhurst holds the three of the top vault scores with three 9.90's, while Laing has the third best with her 9.950 at the A-10 Championships.

West Virginia's awesome score of 195.500 at the A-10 Championships led the team scoring, while UMass' season best of 190.925 was second.

The list of student-athletes from UMass who were named to the 1994-95 USAir/Atlantic Ten All-Academic Team for the winter season was released this weekend.

Two athletes from the team were given the honor, as senior Exercise Science major Erica Baum and junior Environmental Science major Ruth Reeves made the grade, with GPAs of 3.61 and 3.60 respectively.

To be chosen for the team, the student-athlete must have a GPA over 3.00, and be a starter or key reserve for the team. This ends Baum's career on an even higher note, as she already has received an award, created in her name, for both her team and school work this year.

Softball sweeps St. Bonaventure, Vermont

■ Pitchers Daut, Ortega pick up two more victories each

By Andrew Bryce and Candice Flemming

The University of Massachusetts softball team actually played a scheduled home doubleheader and played a makeup game yesterday afternoon, all in one weekend.

In a stretch of games where the trend called for cancellations due to inclement weather, the Minutewomen finally got to play on their home field for the first time this season. At Totman Field, Massachusetts (19–11, 6–0 in Atlantic 10) swept St. Bonaventure (9–1, 6–2) on Saturday, and Vermont yesterday (7–0, 7–3).

As for the weather this weekend, just two weeks into springtime, the two days saw frigid weather in both double headers. Saturday's games were played in a snowstorm.

Despite the bad weather conditions, Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino was pleased with the weekend efforts of Kelly Daut and Dani Ortega, among others.

"Both pitchers had a good, solid performances this weekend. It was hard — you know, they haven't had a nice day," Sortino said. "[Saturday] was just horrendous. We played in a snowstorm. Your back, everything gets sore.

"So I think they did very well. They hit the ball well, we know this team can score runs, and it was nice to play at home."

Massachusetts 9, St. Bonaventure 1

The calendar read April 8 and the forecast called for sunny skies, but someone forgot to tell Mother Nature because there was snow falling.

Even with the conditions, Saturday's doubleheader against Atlantic 10 foe St. Bonaventure was still played with UMass sweeping the Bonnies in two shortened games, 9–1 and 6–2. The first game was stopped after five innings due to the mercy rule and the second game was stopped after six innings because of the inclement weather.

Daut got the start in the first game and gave up just three hits and one earned run while striking out six in her five innings of work.

The Bonnies scored their only run off Daut in the top of the third inning when Missy Rust tripled to centerfield, scoring Kerry Dowd. The Minutewomen got all of the runs they would need in the third, scoring four.

Chris Martens had four RBIs in the first game of Saturday's doubleheader as Massachusetts softball swept double headers from St. Bonaventure and Vermont.

UMass got four more runs in the bottom of the fourth and one in the fifth for the final score.

Massachusetts 6, St. Bonaventure 2

Ortega started the second game, striking out three while giving up one earned run. The Minutewomen scored most of its runs in the third inning when three runners crossed the plate. Amy Powell (two RBI) drove in a run with her double hit down the third base line, and then a run scored on a Mareina line drive hit up the middle.

UMass scored one run in each of the last two innings to round out its scoring. The Bonnies got both of their runs in the top of the sixth.

Heather Dorsey went 2–2 with an RBI, Buckley went 2–4 with and RBI and Osier finished 2–3.

The Minutewomen made great defensive plays all day despite the poor conditions, with the highlights being a diving stop on a grounder by Osier and a over the head catch in center field by Mareina.

Massachusetts 7, Vermont 0

The Lady Catamounts led off the game with a Kristen Briggs single, the only hit they got throughout the game. Minutewoman Sam Cardenas led off the bottom of the first with a triple, one of 14 hits to come in the

Tolhurst wins all–around & qualifies for NCAAs

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Junior J.J. Tolhurst of the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team took the all around title this weekend at the NCAA Northeast Regionals in Kent, Ohio. With the score of 38.350, the team's most consistent performer just outpaced UNH's No. 1 regionally–ranked gymnast Jana Reardon by only two one–hundredths of a point. With this first place finish, Tolhurst has now locked up an automatic bid for herself to the NCAA Championships this April 20–22 in Athens, Ga.

In the team competition, the Minutewomen finished below their average season score of 190.175, ending up in fourth place (187.925). The No. 11 nationally ranked Lady Lions from Penn State captured the automatic bid to the Nationals with an overall score of 191.225; while Kent State (188.950) and the University of New Hampshire (188.925) took the second and third places. Both the No. 1 (PSU) and the No. 2 (KSU) seeds going in were able to bounce back from late season injuries, leaving KSU now in the hunt for an at large bid.

With five automatic bids for the Nationals going to regional champions, the possibility for the UMass team to receive one of the seven at large bids now appears to be bleak. But this can all be considered to be a learning experience, especially for a squad that has youth on its side for the future. Except for senior Erica Baum, the whole squad, plus one of the top incoming recruiting classes in the country, will be returning for next season.

In the other individual events, sophomore Tara Swartz finished in fourth place on the uneven bars (9.750), helping to place her sixth in the all around with a score of 37.800. Fifth place in the vault was the result for sophomore Lianne Laing, as she was the top UMass finisher in her steadiest event with a 9.650.

This Northeast Regional all around title caps off a transitional season for the Liverpool, N.Y. native. The George Washington University transfer has now put an exclamation mark on her season, and overall career, up to this point. This trip to the NCAA Championships will not be news for Tolhurst, as she also qualified in the all around two years ago while she still attended GWU.

Now with a successful season, and her end of the season No. 5 ranking for the all around in the Northeast Region, she has once again regained the top form of her recent past this year for UMass. The consummate team player will now be carrying the torch for the team, as the decision on the status of Swartz' and Laing's possible trips to Athens is still up in the air.

End of the Season Notes: With the completion of the Atlantic 10 schedule, the Minutewomen had their share of the top scores for the overall season. 4in the compiled all around scores, Swartz (38.875) and Tolhurst (38.675) held three of the top fifteen scores with these career best tallies.

Minutemen sweep Temple

Despite harsh weather, UM extends winning streak to 10

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

Snow and frigid weather could not stop the University of Massachusetts baseball team from playing at Earl Lorden Field last weekend — and Temple University couldn't stop the Minutemen from winning.

Massachusetts (14–6, 8–1 Atlantic 10) swept a three game–series from A–10 rival Temple, pushing its winning streak to 10. The Owls fell to 7–26 overall, 4–10 in conference.

Despite a steady snow fall and temperatures in the 20s on Saturday, the Minutemen won the first contest of the series, 8–1, behind a strong pitching performance from senior ace Jay Murphy.

Murphy (3–2) escaped a shaky first inning and cruised the rest of the way for the complete game victory, holding the Owls to four hits while striking out three. The righthander lost his bid for a shutout with one out in the seventh inning when Temple designated hitter Ron Schenk blasted a home run.

"With the weather, it was tough to keep the tears out of my eyes," Murphy said. "I tried to buckle down and throw strikes when I got into trouble."

Owl leadoff hitter Tom Bianco singled off of Murphy to start the game and advanced to second when left fielder Dean Tomlinson walked. After getting third baseman Thomas Whalen to line out to right, Murphy jammed clean–up hitter Rich Swavely, forcing him to pop to short.

With two on and two out, Schenk flew out to left, allowing Murphy and the Minutemen to get out of the first frame unscathed.

The Massachusetts offense would provide all the support Murphy needed in the fourth inning. After third baseman Brad Gorrie walked and advanced to second on a sacrifice bunt by center fielder Nate Murphy, right fielder Bill Knight singled up the middle, plating Gorrie and giving the Minutemen a 1–0 lead. Knight finished the day with two hits, two runs batted in and one run scored.

One batter later and one out, designated hitter Nelson Ubaldo cranked his third HR of the season over the 400–foot sign, into the trees in centerfield.

"I crushed that ball. I hit it pretty good," Ubaldo said. "The kid left a high fastball and I just went with it, trying to get on top of it. The ball just took off."

How much of a factor was the weather?

"It's hard [to hit in cold weather]. With the snow, you have to concentrate just a little bit more," Ubaldo said. "You go up there trying to get the head of the bat out, because if you get jammed, your hands will be ringing all day."

In the second game of the series, which was moved from Saturday to yesterday because of the weather, Andy Pelis' one–out base hit in the bottom of the seventh scored

Women's water polo shines at tourney

By Steven Grant
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's water polo team continues to enjoy its first ever season on the varsity level, as the Minutewomen won all four of their games in this past weekend's Eastern Water Polo Association tournament held at UMass' own Totman Pool.

Coach Bob Newcomb's squad, who now own an 8–6 record (7–1, EWPA), actually outscored its opponents a total of 55–25 in the four–game sweep, beating Amherst College (13–7) on Friday night, MIT (12–4) and Bowdoin (12–6) on Saturday, and Dartmouth (18–8) on Sunday.

"It was a very good weekend for us, both offensively and defensively," Newcomb said. "And our defense especially was strong, except for a few occasional breakdowns. We're just taking [our opponents'] offense out of the game.

"One thing we've been trying to improve on lately is our turnover to steal ratio, and we were able to do that this weekend. Before, we were in negative numbers as a team. But in these past four games we had a 'plus–22'[steals], so I'm very pleased with that."

The win over Amherst, which drew an estimated 180 fans, was fueled by sophomore Vicky Bamond, perhaps the MVP of the weekend, and junior Michelle Hannigan, who scored four goals each. Junior goalie Jessica Griffith also came up big, registering eight saves.

Bamond scored a team–high 18 goals over the four meets, proving to be too much for opposing defenses.

"I'm very happy with the way we played," Bamond said. "We've come a long way, and I think that we've improved 100 percent [over last year]. I think we've learned to control the game and slow the pace down. Playing strong teams in our trip to California really helped us a lot."

The win over MIT was the first in the history of the program. Junior Mirca Martinez Cruz nailed a season–high seven goals, while Bamond pitched in two. The Minutewomen obviously put forth a strong defensive effort, as well, holding the Engineers to a mere four points.

"We're doing better than I expected," Martinez said. I'm very happy with how we are doing. Right now we are playing more like a team, and that's important."

Against Bowdoin, Bamond had another superb performance, netting six goals, while junior Meghan O'Connor also played well, scoring thrice.

UMass had their best offensive output in their affair with Dartmouth, tallying 18. Bamond had a lot to do with this, scoring seven goals and adding three assists. Martinez and Hannigan scored three goals each while combining for five assists.

"Dartmouth is a very athletic team, although they might not be quite as experienced as we are," Newcomb said. Their swimming ability is great. Playing against teams like them enable us to improve our counter–attack, and I think we were indeed able to shut them down."

Overall, the coach was obviously pleased with his team's effort over the weekend, particularly with some individual performances.

"Vicky has really been helping to lead us out there," Newcomb said. "She just gives us that extra experience.

"And Jessica Griffith has only been playing four weeks and is already leading our defense. She has a good sense of where to be and how to stop things. Also, Michelle Hannigan has shown great improvement, going from a bench player to a serious contributor.

"Next, Heather Saunders has been very important, anchoring the defense with Jessica. She just loves getting down there and shutting down the hole. Both her and Barbara Hickey had solid weekends," Newcomb said.

The Minutewomen will return to action on April 21–23, when they travel to Cambridge, Mass. to participate in the EWPA North Division Playoffs, and coach Newcomb is clearly looking forward to it.

"We still have to work on both sides of our power play, and some of our defensive breakdowns ... but right now we're starting to play as a team," said the coach. "We're learning to look and listen for each other. Just three weeks ago I would never have said that."

Washington rally draws 50,000 to capital city

By Lisa Greenfield

WASHINGTON — Riot Grrrl, the Northampton feminist organization responsible for organizing busses carrying students from the Five College area to the National Organization for Women rally in Washington D.C., was singled out as the fastest organized delegation attending.

Six busses carrying approximately 300 students left Haigis Mall at 2 a.m. on Sunday for the April 9, NOW "Rally for Women's Lives."

Park police estimated 50,000 people attended the conference, while Patricia Ireland, president of NOW, estimated a quarter of a million attendees.

Violence against women was tied to a variety of issues, including economic inequality, abortion access, welfare cuts, affirmative action and political injustice.

Many attendees made political statements with signs, banners, t–shirts and body paint. Some popular slogans were "Keep your laws off my body" and "Newt happens when 61 percent of the population doesn't vote."

Kim Gandy, executive vice president of NOW, began the rally identifying one of the most repeated themes of the day, "[Sending] a message to Newt Gingrich and his cronies that we won't go back."

"We won't go back" was the official slogan of the day, repeatedly chanted. Many speakers, such as Ireland, took that motto a step further with "We won't go back, we will go forward."

"We are the future and we will never go back, if it means going to jail or it means turning this government upside down ... we will not go back," Gandy said.

UMass seniors Elisabeth Allen and Felicities Boisvert said the most moving speaker at the five–hour rally was Katie Kester, a rape survivor and activist, who called for college students to "stand up and take action."

"Rape will not be an unfortunate miscommunication. We will not take it. I beg you to stand up for yourself and speak," Kester said.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson began his speech pointing out that April 9 was the anniversary of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s burial. He recalled King's contract with America to stop violence against all people.

Jackson said there should be as many men at the rally as women, because "none of us are secure until all of us are secure."

He urged the crowd to "turn our pain into power" and work towards gender equality and racial justice.

Patricia Ireland

The NOW president said this rally "is about power, this rally is about control and the use of force to keep control—physical force or the force of the government."

She, like many other speakers of the day, criticized Newt Gingrich and his politics.

"If we hear from Newt's mom that he thinks Hilary Clinton is a b–i–t–c–h, we know that Newt Gingrich cannot stand Hillary Rodham Clinton, or any woman, being in total control of herself."

Ireland said Congress is "still 90 percent men, 90 percent white, 100

ABC cracks down on out–of–state licenses

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Many local bars were cracking down on fake identifications this weekend as Amherst was visited by officials from the Alcohol Beverage Commission (ABC).

Out–of–state i.d.s were particularly suspect since many phony New Jersey licenses are being produced and circulated around campus, said George Smith, manager of Delano's.

"If it's an out–of–state license we're screwed," Smith said, "It's almost not worth letting people in with out–of–state i.d.s"

Other local bar and restaurant managers and owners were aware of the presence of ABC officials. According to local managers, ABC officials checked the place out and left. Only one minor incident was reported.

Massachusetts military i.d.s, motor vehicle licenses, liquor licenses, or passports are the only valid i.d.s in the state. State law protects licensees if they rely on Massachusetts i.d.s, said Stewart Krusell, chairman of ABC.

State law does not protect licensees if out–of–state i.d.s are used, Krusell said.

If there is a violation, the inspectors will file a complaint with the commission which results in a hearing in Boston. The commission may rule to suspend, cancel, modify or revoke the liquor serving license of the restaurant or bar owner. Suspension is most common, he said.

Fines may be offered in lieu of license suspension, said Peter Connelly, executive secretary for ABC. Fines are based on a formula depending on the yearly liquor incomes of the restaurant.

It is legitimate to question all out of state i.d.s.

"The bars are just looking out for their best interest," Krusell said.

If the licensee feels the commission has been unjust with them, they may appeal to court system, Connelly said.

Krusell can not discuss any pending cases, but he does not think any reports have been filed yet.

College towns may have a higher percentage of underage drinkers, but the ABC fairly distributes its investigators throughout the state, Krusell said.

The ABC, located in Boston, sends investigators to cities throughout the state, sometimes in cooperation with local police. These investigators inspect local bars and alcohol serving restaurants.

Captain Charles Sherpa from the Amherst police department said policioes have not changed in 20 years and it is the prerogative of the licensee on whom to serve.

"The owner doesn't have to serve anyone if he doesn't want to," Sherpa said. "It has nothing to do with the police department."

Housing fair offers many helpful hints

By Matthew Wurtzel

Students can go apartment shopping today in between classes while they roam through the Campus Center Concourse.

The University of Massachusetts Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center is hosting its annual Complex Housing Fair.

About 25 realtors and complexes from the Amherst and Sunderland area will be on hand to answer any questions students may have about their facilities.

"It will be great because students can compare complexes while 'shopping,'" said Joanne Levenson, director of Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center.

In addition to complexes and condominiums, D.H. Jones will have their rental agent present to inform students about homes students may be interested in renting.

Levenson said the complexes offer students the chance to sign waiting lists for next semester. Most students who sign waiting lists usually are offered the opportunity to sign leases.

Students do not have to pay to sign a waiting list, nor are they obligated to sign a lease assuming they are offered the chance.

Students should be prepared to ask representatives questions about facilities. Students should ask about parking, utilities, leasing time tables, pet policies, and number of residence per apartment.

Many complexes offer limited parking based on the number of bed–

Bergman finishes lecture series

By Liz Burke

American University Professor Barbara Bergman delivered the final lecture in her series, The Economic Emergence of Women. Bergman is well–respected in the field of economics and is best known for her work with the Clinton administration concerning affirmative action.

The lecture, entitled "A Policy Agenda for Women," was sponsored by the Mount Holyoke Department of Economics.

Bergman began the lecture by recalling previous failed attempts to reform the welfare system. She further stated these reform attempts began during the Nixon administration.

Bergman argued the reforms have failed because many families remain unable to get off welfare due to the shortage of decent paying jobs which would provide health insurance and child care. She calculated that if a woman pays an estimated $5000 in child care for one year, she will need to earn approximately $22,000 per year to meet the needs of her family.

If a woman has such a job opportunity, she can afford to stop receiving welfare. But, if she can only find a position paying minimum wage without benefits she would have to continue receiving welfare, Bergman speculated.

In an attack on the Republican Party, Bergman criticized the GOP for having what she called, "compassion for the working woman by taking away what the

UM men's hoop tribute to raise money for scholarship funds

University of Massachusetts fans will have the opportunity to win a seat on the bench with Coach John Calipari at a fund–raiser in Boston.

The UMass Alumni Association's fourth annual "Tribute to UMass Men's Basketball" will be held at the Sheraton Boston & Towers on April 20.

"It's the big tribute of the year," said John Fuedo, executive director of the UMass Alumni Association. "The event will raise money for athletic programs and scholastic scholarship funds."

The Alumni Association has existed at UMass for more than 120 years However it is only in the past five years that it has become a "more active partner" with the University, according to Fuedo.

Last year, the event raised nearly $22,000 through ticket sales and a Silent Auction. Proceeds from the night went to programs such as the Alumni Scholars Program.

This year's auction will feature prizes that include the chance to sit on the bench with UMass coaches John Calipari, Joanie O'Brien, Mike Hodges and Joe Mallen. Golf outings and dinners will also be auctioned off.

Organizers project that nearly 600 UMass fans will turn out for the fund–raiser next week, according to Fuedo.

"We want to show that we appreciate the effort of our athletic programs," said Fuedo. "Though much of the focus is on the men's basketball team, the association is a long–time supporter of both men and women's athletic programs."

Guests including sports journalists Sean McDonough and Steve Buckley are among the many celebrities scheduled to attend the event from media, government and sports.

Calipari is also scheduled to be a guest speaker. In addition, all UMass coaches have been invited to attend along with coach Calipari's staff and his former players.

Passover opportunities abound in area

By Jacob W. Michaels

Passover preparations for students on campus are beginning now.

Passover is the Jewish celebration of the escape from slavery in Egypt, under the Pharaoh. As part of the celebration there is a ritual meal, called a Seder, where Jews remember their escape and the help given to them by God.

There are various opportunities for students on campus to celebrate the holiday.

The University dining commons will be serving Kosher for Passover meals. Dianne Sutherland, a registered dietician, said, "There's always one or two entrees that [contain] no flour, no legumes, no pork or shellfish." The dining commons will be serving the meals starting at dinner on April 14 and continuing to dinner on April 22.

The Kosher dining common in Hampden Southwest will also serve Kosher for passover meals throughout Passover. There will be informal student–led Seders on Friday and Saturday nights at 5:15 p.m. Students who wish to attend and are not on the Kosher dining meal plan must purchase tickets by noon tomorrow at Franklin DC.

Chabad house will also be holding a Seder on April 14 at 7 p.m. and April 15 at 8 p.m. The Seders will be conducted in English by Rabbi Chaim Adelman. Seder cost is $5 per person per Seder.

National Chabad is also sponsoring "The Great North American Pesach Seder" program where college students can call to get a free "Seder–To–Go." It comes with a box of Matzohs, a bottle of Kosher grape juice, and a Seder guide. For more information about the Seders to go, students can call Rabbi Adelman at Chabad House.

Due to the long weekend Hillel is organizing "Home Hospitality Seders," where students can attend a Seder with a family from the local community.

Lastly, there will be a Multicultural Seder on April 19. This Seder is specially designed to represent a variety of communities on campus including Native Americans, Asians, African Americans and members of the GLBT community, as well as Jewish students. Reservations should be made with Hillel.

Peer tutors acknowledged for their work

For the first time ever, the University of Massachusetts Learning Resources Center (LRC) certified its peer tutors.

Twelve peer tutors were presented with their certificates of completion in a short ceremony held in the W.E.B. Du Bois Library last Friday afternoon.

The tutors were invited to make short statements about their experiences working within the program.

"I realized that everyone has a different learning ability — some less, some more — and I've been able to adapt to that," said Kevin Drozdowski, a senior wildlife biology major.

The ceremony was hosted by the director of the LRC, Humberto Segura, who spoke about the overall goals of the peer tutoring program and the LRC.

"[We try] to provide services that attract other students, and to make learning fun," Segura said.

Some of the services cited were study skills programs, computer tutorials and the peer advising program. The most effective strategy that the LRC offers is peer tutoring, said Segura.

The peer tutoring program is the most important part of the center's resources, Segura said.

"It teaches you to communicate with everyone, so it's not necessarily important that you can use terms in graduate student's books," said Seth Appel, a sophomore School of

Campus trespassers warned, arrested

The University of Massachusetts police arrested three individuals for trespassing on campus this weekend after they had received a warning earlier that morning.

Patrick M. McGrath, 22, Michael Reidy, 20, and Robert Sutherland, 21, all from Worcester, were arrested for trespassing at approximately 2 p.m. this Saturday, police said.

Staff at Washington Residence Hall reported a disturbance at about 3 a.m. that morning in which the individuals were involved. The three were issued warnings and escorted off campus, police said.

According to police, Washington staff called again reporting they allegedly returned, but could not be found.

The three were then arrested when found in a car on Stadium Drive, police said.

rooms, and some places include utilities while others do not.

Some complexes offer students nine and 10-month leases rather than strictly 12-month leases. Levenson said most landlords strictly enforce most policies especially pet and noise policies.

Following the fair, students should visit facilities during both day and night to see whether they think the complex is where they really want to live, said Levenson.

When students prepare to sign a lease, they should bring it either to Legal Services or Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center. Levenson said many students sign leases without understanding it.

Rights and Responsibilities as a Landlord or Tenant in the Town of Amherst and other pamphlets about leases and rights as a renter will be handed out at the fair.

Levenson said students prefer apartment complexes and condominiums because they are low maintenance

The LRC was created in fall 1994 to improve retention and graduation rates on campus and, according to Segura, assisted more than 600 students during the first semester of operation.

The LRC received certification for its tutor training program by the College Reading and Learning Association (CRLA) the same semester.

The CRLA provides nationally recognized guidelines and standards for the training program, said Segura.

The LRC found that more than 90 percent of the students who participated in their supplemental instruction program for Calculus 127, improved their academic performance "significantly" over those who didn't participate.

Segura hopes to keep the program active and growing on campus.

"We have just started to make a contribution," Segura said.

Economic inequity

Ireland and other speakers attacked proposed welfare cuts, saying those cuts will hurt women, children and families.

Cheri Honkala, a welfare recipient and a representative from the Kensington Welfare Rights Union said people should "stop talking about violence until you start talking about economic violence."

She said welfare mothers do not want pity they want power.

Sandy Warsaw representative from the grass roots organization for older women said cuts in Medicaid and Medicare hurt the older people as well as the poor.

Warsaw said people need to stand up for the rights of older women. She reflected on the history of women's rights movements and the principle of "the personal is political."

Family values

Rabbi Lynn Lanseberg said she was at the rally on behalf of religious people to tell those in leadership "you are not religious people, you are hypocrites."

She called politicians hypocrites who "with one hand [would] put words of prayer into the mouths of children and with the other hand take food out of the very same mouths."

Lanseberg also called it hypocritical for politicians to advocate prayer, while constructing policies that pray on the elderly, the poor, the disabled and the disadvantaged. She attacked the double standard of politicians calling a poor woman who wishes to stay home with her children lazy, while a middle class woman who stays home with her children is practicing traditional family values.

Artistic support

Actresses Sharon Gless and Tyne Daly of "Cagney and Lacey" and Cheryl James, Salt of Salt n' Pepa, spoke about their experiences as women and their roles as mothers.

Several musicians performed, such as Toad the Wet Sprocket, Betty, Joan Jett and the Blackhearts and Luscious Jackson. Most of the songs performed addressed violence against women.

non-working woman has, cutting her off from Medicaid and welfare."

Bergman said these cuts would be inefficient and would make many children miserable, nullifying the Republican creed that they would be improving the morals of the welfare family.

Proposing a feminist welfare reform patterned after a current program in France, Bergman suggested providing working parents with health insurance and child care, the two major components that are key to successful welfare reform.

Bergman said she believes, "if we really wanted this [welfare reform], we could afford it."

Concluding with a short discussion of affirmative action, Bergman stressed its importance for women by saying "if all discrimination was in the past, we would not need affirmative action."

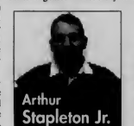
Opinion/Editorial

Out–of–state need not apply



Arthur Stapleton Jr.

It ain't ZooMass anymore.

I think back to my freshman year here at the University and all of the drunken nights and long walks back to Southwest, wondering where all the fun has gone. From the green house on Sunset Avenue to outdoor bashes at Hobart and Gilreath, there used to be a party on every corner.

However, somewhere along the line the beer-filled fun known as the weekends has disappeared. Yeah, I know, there are still those weak parties at Brandywine, or the bonanzas on North Pleasant Street that get broken up by 10 p.m., 11 if you're lucky. The fact remains that a good party is hard to find.

Then, there is uptown, a place where the alcohol is expensive and the pizza at Antonio's is cheap. That's where you find almost every above-age student who is sick of parties. The big glass window at Time Out, the pool table at Barsie's, the live band at Delano's, the dancing at The Pub, the 10-cent nuggets at Charlie's and the townies at the Spoke — ahh, the life of a 21-year-old in Amherst ...

Hold on a minute. Maybe that's not going to be the case anymore. Why, you ask? Well, this past Saturday night I attempted to frequent two of my favorite watering holes and was told by two different bouncers that they were not allowing anyone with a New Jersey license in. I eventually got in because the guys were my friends, but what about other students?

I witnessed at least six students get bounced from a bar uptown, all from New Jersey, whether or not their identification was fake or authentic. You see, several bars were forced by Alcohol Beverage Control (ABC) to watch out for fake Jersey and New Hampshire driver's licenses. The ABC fines establishments for out-of-state fake i.d.s, according to George Smith, the manager of Delano's. Nothing to that extreme happens to the place if the fake i.d. is from in-state, in this case, Massachusetts.

O.K., let's look at the numbers for this University. For this past semester, 25.6 percent of the undergraduate population (17,504) was from out-of-state, according to statistics provided by the Office of Institutional Research, including 808 from N.J. and 134 from N.H.

Obviously, not all of the students are of legal drinking age, but I'm going to estimate at least one quarter of them are. Most likely, they were not getting into the bars last Saturday night because of the ABC. They have a driver's license, two forms of back-up and have to take their business elsewhere because the establishment's proverbial hands are tied by the ABC.

Just think of this — no out-of-state licenses at all. Period. It could be the wave of the future for the bars uptown in Amherst and a lot of places, especially if the ABC continues to heavily enforce a hefty fine. Here again, I'm guessing, but how much do you think a place like Time Out makes on a weekend?

So here lies the problem — we out-of-state folks get screwed because we don't live in Massachusetts and the bars suffer because they can't risk the fine. It's not their fault — just consi.d.er it a sweeping order. Instead of trying to figure out who is really of age and who belongs back at a high school party, they'll just keep 'em all out.

As of right now, there is no such rule in any of the establishments uptown. The ABC will continue its regulation of the bars and keep handing out fines when necessary. If it ever gets to the point, though, when out-of-state students are not permitted inside, I hope I'm not around.

No matter how much I get sick of standing around singing "Margaritaville" in Time Out or battling the cigarette smoke in Charlie's, it sure beats that long, pitiful walk to Brandywine.

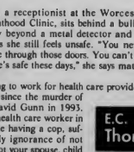
Consequences of pro–choice



E.C. Thomas

Even as Chris, a receptionist at the Worcester Planned Parenthood Clinic, sits behind a bullet-proof window beyond a metal detector and an armed guard, she says she still feels unsafe. "You never know who could come through those doors. You can't be too cautious — no one's safe these days," she says matter of factly.

Getting up and going to work for health care providers hasn't been the same since the murder of Florida abortionist David Gunn in 1993. These days, having a health care worker in the family is much like having a cop, suffering through a daily ignorance of not knowing whether or not your spouse, child or parents will come home at night. The concept that a health care worker is on a target list, simply for providing legal medical services to women, boggles the mind.

No doubt Shannon's family is still trying to understand how and why a receptionist could be on a target list after her death two months ago in Brookline. But according to the anti-choice movement, "We're in a war —" and war means innocent people will be killed, so we shouldn't get excited.

One anti-choice extremist mailed a letter to Congress last July preceding the massive killing of abortionists and their staffs. The letter also outlined a target list including members of the ACLU, Planned Parenthood and NOW, saying they would be sought out and terminated.

It comes as no surprise that since the anti-choice extremist primary tactics have increasingly been threats of murder, clinics are closing their doors and doctors are giving up their practices. That's the whole point, making abortion, although a legal right for women, inaccessible for them. But whether you are anti or pro-choice, the extremist movement, in their zeal for making political statements, have moved the abortion debate into an apolitical area of our society.

Despite what you may think about abortion, these people are making health care in general inaccessible for some women. Closing clinics and stopping doctors from practicing gynecology, means many women — and children— won't get the safe and affordable health care they need. Care for themselves, their newborns or their babies to come.

"I'd like to hope that more doctors will provide health care services for women, but I think a lot of them are still afraid to get into the field, they might be shot," says one receptionist.

It strikes me as rather ironic that women can cause such a stir in politics. If its not the way they raise their children, it's whether or not they should take birth control, or obtain an abortion, or climb the corporate ladder, or ignore their boss' jokes about their breasts or what they wear at night. Women are indeed fascinating creatures— but men aren't exactly easy to figure out either— why haven't their health care issues entered the social, economic and political arena?

Rev. Bruce Murch, director of the Christian Pro–Life Action Network in Springfield, shows no concern over the rise of death threats to health care workers. "As far as I'm concerned the unborn child deserve the same protection that a born child deserves," he chides self–righteously.

Well, then, Rev. Murch, what about the children who need health care services or the women who need pre–natal care, but can't get to an affordable clinic? What protection do they deserve?

What about bride–to–be Shannon and her future plans to have children? What protection did she deserve? Believing in a woman's right to choose has always been regarded as a slogan in only the abortion movement. As far as I can tell, being pro–choice has come to represent a woman's right to make and follow through on the choices in her life.

"Just because these particular terrorists are U.S. citizens does not make them any less dangerous or any less of a threat to democracy and freedom," says Gina Shaw of the National Abortion Federation. "They're not going to stop with choice. If they win this battle they'll try another one." Unfortunately, it would seem they've gained a following and already have.

The rise of citizen militias

Peter Orvetti

A new force has risen on the lunatic right. With the rhetoric of the Perot populist movement, and the politics of David Duke and the Aryan Nationals, the militia movement is prepared to fight "for the people" — with guns.

In 35 states, citizen militias have sprouted up. Some have membership in the thousands. These groups insist that their sole purpose is to serve as direct representatives for the interests of the populace. Their true motives are much darker.

The militias were once written off as fringe groups dominated by Second Amendment extremists. Now, their true motives are clearer. The leaders of these groups insist that they have cleaned out all the "wackos" — meaning Nazis and anti–Semites — from their ranks. But these bigots remain. In fact, they are the leaders.

The militias grew after the federal government began enacting gun control legislation. Gun owners formed what are, in essence, citizen–armies. Militia heads claim that the role of the groups is to assist police and the military in maintaining the law. When questioned why the militias necessary by officers from these organizations, the militiamen have no answer.

They have no answer because they are lying. One Michigan militia "colonel" said in national television that his group intended to defend "the people." However, you won't see a militia assisting a person who is not White. The militia, in fact, will be the ones tying the noose.

According to the Souther Poverty Law Center's Klanwatch, at least eight militias have ties with White supremacist groups. These militias spread the word of their Nazi/military wedding over the Internet, to the rest of the country. As they search for more adherents, the militias prepare to become the army of the American Nazi movement.

John Trochmann heads the Militia of Montana. The same Trochmann told the 1990 Aryan Nations Congress, "we don't want to go to the cartridge box, but if we will if we have to." Trochmann also calls the Washington government "unlawful and without authority." Sounds vaguely like current populist polemic.

That is no surprise. Many militia members did not know what they were becoming a part of. These folks went to a meeting at the Legion Hall or at someone's house, and signed up for a group defending Second Amendment rights. Pretty soon, they were given uniforms, ranks and a place in the growing Fascist movement.

The militias work hard to remain separate from the Nazis and the Klan on paper. They appear on talk shows and assert that they are merely protecting their Constitutional rights on a grassroots level. In reality, they are stockpiling weapons for what Trochmann's nephew calls the "day of reckoning at hand."

Lunatic rightist Bo Gritoz has founded the town of Almost Heaven, Idaho, which exists on totalitarian, military guidelines. Minorities, Jews and gays are suspect, if not forbidden entirely. In 1992, Gritz received two percent of Idaho's vote for president as the candidate of the Popular Party. The same minor party that ran Duke for president in 1988.

Two percent sounds small, but that is one out of every 50 people. Do you know 50 people? Take a good look at them all. One of your best friends might be a Nazi.

Letters to the Editor

Editorial not based on fact

To the editor:

I am writing in response to Mark McGrath's article "Don't tinker with genetics." Although there are a few good points in his article, I also notice a disturbing flaw in his statement.

He wrote "When it comes down to it, these scientists are motivated by nothing but greed." Hmmm, were you ever molested by a scientist? On what fact do you base this claim on? Mr. McGrath, do you know how long scientist had to slave over their discipline before they learn enough to begin work? Do you realize that most money made does not go to them, but to the underworked, overpaid executives and corporate structure? Do you even know the main reason why the scientist is to solve riddles of the universe though they may be condemn? Does Galileo and Copernicus ring a bell? Reminder: one was burnt by the church and the other forced to repent. These are the prices for searching for the truth.

I agree there is an ethnic issue to consider, but the society is structured such that ordering a McKid is highly improbable even if the technology is there. Society is not going to let it happen. Remember the law makers? Though I am uninspired by their past record, I trust they are not paranoid over Jurassic Park as you are. They know they relied on the researcher's labor to live longer and healthier lives. We are entering a new era and should proceed cautiously, making necessary adjustments to our rules along the way. We should not "cut off genetic research as a whole" and go back to the caves. If you think you are superior in that you don't need the scientist, try not using electricity, running water and toilet paper for a week. Tell your ailing friend/family to suspend treatment because it will fuel the "greedy scientist" in their quest for a cure. I am sure the result will entertain you.

Lastly, you mention a situation of the future couple's choice to decide or keep their unborn child knowing he/she is mentally retarded. You then whine about who will foot the bill if the insurance company will not. If the couple decides to introduce a burden to society, shouldn't they bear part of the consequence of their decision? It's time to look at the whole picture, Mark. You should spend time weighing the cause and effect of events before fringe shots at a productive segment of society. Perhaps if you take a few science courses to see what makes a scientist, you will agree they are the modestly paid, unappreciated pioneers that they are.

Escort receptionists should be polite

To the editor:

I am writing to express my disappointment with the UMass escort service. I used to be a security escort myself and I never had a problem with the escorts before. All the drivers were very nice and professional. However, my complaint has to do with the staff who answer the escort phone line. I recently received contradictory information from two staff members, because of the misinformation, I was forced to walk home alone in the dark.

I have rehearsals every Sunday night at the Campus Center. Since they get out very late, and my home (Presidential Apartments) is down a poorly–lit part of the North Pleasant Street, my boyfriend suggested that I call the escort service. I called, and was told by a woman that they do indeed go as far as North Village, which is right after Presidential.

However, I was surprised and annoyed when I called after my next rehearsal to be told by a young man that I "must have heard the wrong information." He punctuated this with a chuckle that was more than a little snide. I walked home.

Campus escort service needs to get their act together and make sure that the young people they hire to answer the phones are not only more competent, but polite as well.

Telefund asks for too much

To the editor:

A recent phone conversation with my parents revealed some interesting information. Apparently my mother received a phone call from a young woman who began by saying "I know that you have a daughter who attends UMass. Does she like it here?"

After a bit more useless banter, the young woman hit my mother with the question "Would it be possible for you to donate $1000 to the University?"

I come from the average middle–class family which has very little money left after paying the bills, the mortgage, etc. The inquiry for hand–outs was lowered to $500, then $100, and finally the woman snapped, "Well can't you give anything?"

Neither of my parents are UMass alumni, nor do they have any connection to the school except for the fact that their daughter is a student here. It is unfair for Telefund callers to pressure parents into donating large amounts of money. I know that the callers are only doing their job and it is unfair as well to place the blame on them. However, the organizers of Telefund should realize that most students' families are scraping by just to afford tuition. Few of my friend's families have an extra $1000 to toss around. It angers me that the University assumes they do.

The hidden Burma story

SLORC reigns as the oppressive tyrant

'A country in chaos'

Zaw Min
Collegian Correspondent

Let me tell you a story of a land far away. It is a story that a lot of people are not familiar with. In this strange land, the people suffer great pain. Day and night are a constant mourn of grievances for the dead. Those who fight are the brave ones of the land. Under continual fear of losing, the brave ones struggle ferociously against an evil oppressor.

This land is Burma, and it is this land that my relatives and I have lived on with plenty of emotion. You see, Burma is a giant cauldron of many ethnic groups. Its mix of ethnicity is the largest in Southeast Asia, causing sensitive differences between ethnicities. For most of its history the Burmans, being the largest ethnicity, have controlled the land and have built prosperous kingdoms. It was not until the British occupation that Burmans realized that they themselves were not the rulers of the land. It took collaboration with all ethnicities to will a champion effort in gaining independence.

The Japanese came into Burma soon after, but the unison of the ethnicities was too strong. Burma became a totally autonomous nation after the Japanese withdrawal, only to suffer a ruthless military takeover by General U Ne Win in 1962. Burma at that point became a totalitarian state, creating an internal conflict between the military and other ethnicities.

By 1988, pro–democracy demonstrators heralded a new national leader named Aung San Suu Kyi. She, the daughter of Burma's independence hero Aung San, became a symbol for uniting the nation once again. As tension grew and demanding protests increased, the military took charge and massacred demonstrators. During this turning point, the State Law and Order Restoration Council or better known as the fear–imposing SLORC was formed. SLORC became the new dynamo in Burma's military that sent Aung San Suu Kyi and her National League for Democracy into a state of disarming apathy. SLORC's treachery placed Aung San Suu Kyi under house arrest in 1989. Aung San Suu Kyi's efforts later became recognized as she won Sakharov Prize for Freedom of Thought and the Nobel Peace Prize, both in 1991. Her contact with the world is shunned by SLORC.

SLORC governs the nation with its reckless abandon for human rights sentiments. The name slurs throughout the nation as an intimidating harsh order in Burma's history. It is the new oppressor. SLORC formed a cult–like army of soldiers whose ultimate motive is: absolute control over Burma. Today, SLORC attempts are being challenged by ethnic armies; mainly the Karens. Ethnic groups seek freedom and autonomy from SLORC, and they too will not stop until their demands are met. With ultimate control, SLORC features an alter ego motive of killing other ethnicities.

SLORC is made up of misfits from the Burman ethnic group whose religion is Buddhist. They drove out the Royingas to Bangladesh because they followed the Islamic faith. They have done that to other groups as well. SLORC, with close similarities to the Serbian army is looking to cleanse the land. In the SLORC constitution, the word 'human rights' does not exists. They have raped women and used people as porters and human mine sweepers. They also detain people for unnamed reasons. Their treatment towards other groups is genocide.

The story does not end just yet. There a few more chapters that need to be told.

The issues that Burma brings is more than war between SLORC and ethnic armies. They center around the impact of SLORC's control over the nation. Their management of the country is juxtapose to a bat's vision. Totally blind.

There is skepticism that SLORC may destroy the country in other ways very soon, if it has not done so already. SLORC has an undying lust for money fueled by their need to purchase military weapons. Due to this they have signed contracts (although terminated) with Thai logging firms in exchange for hard currency. These contracts are soon to be renewed. The effects of these contracts are phenomenal, as the once largest teak reserve in the world faces environmental degradation and sustaining the endangered eco– system. This will cause flooding and may impede the growth of the forest. The ramifications on the local people could be overpowered with the loss of their livelihood.

Besides the forest, SLORC is distorting the international image of the country. The international community is fervently positive that the directives of Burma's military junta is to the betterment of the country. There is no admittance by the international community that human rights are violated. Was there immediate action to abet Bangladesh settle the push of Royingas by the SLORC? Was the Thai–Burmas accumulation of refugees a decision by the people to flee voluntarily? Does the fighting against ethnic armies not exist? These questions are addressed against the international community for believing in the contorted SLORC image of Burma.

Insensitivity by both sides has sent more than 400,000 refugees to the border regions. These refugees pose great concern because there is no aid to help them out of their impoverished condition.

The international community thought has addressed the issue of narcotics. SLORC has claimed that they are striking offensives against opium lords. They testament their televised burning of narcotics, and their pictures of burnt drug storages to prove their war against narcotics. There have been rumors that SLORC has been working with drug lords in order to gain profit. Narcotics has been an unsettling issue and is the only one which the international community have admitted to as a potential threat in Burma.

SLORC continues to quell the human rights violations, and at the same time have been able to draw in foreign investors into their new found capitalist ventures. Foreign investors find low wages a benefit and seek further globalization by setting up shop in SLORC's controlled society. This is all a giant façade. Behind the decorated walls, SLORC is reeking profits for their evil demise. Investors may cut trees, dry out shrimp and fish populations, and drain oil reserves. SLORC does not spend time assessing the depletion of natural resources.

Foreign investors may come in and out. Resources may deplete. Yet whatever happens, there is fear. In Burmese cities and towns, large red banners are found in almost all road intersections with propaganda about SLORC and groups of armed men are stationed everywhere. The military run television station airs army marches and ceremonies before programs are shown. Television news may last up to three hours focusing on SLORC's activities. Newspapers do almost the same. Amidst the propaganda, people go about their daily lives being constantly intimidated by the rude silence when SLORC trucks pass through the streets randomly. There is great fear underneath the calm faces of the people. They know that and outbreak will occur if the military peace is disrupted.

Conditions for people socially and economically are in a case of their own. Under SLORC rule, schools have opened and closed at sudden interest. Many students chose not to attend school. Those who leave school find work and settle for meager pay. Low wages are because of distorted exchange rates. The official exchange rate is about U.S. $1 for 6 Kyats. In the looming black market, the rate is about U.S. $1 for 120 kyats. Commodities, because of their scarcity, are placed under black market prices. People earning local currency do not survive, while people earning in dollars virtually live like kings. Although some may live in filth and others in riches, everyone in all walks of life are struggling.

The harsh reality of life in Burma is a grinning smile in the faces of many. They know the horror of life yet they cover the guilt of their oppressors. People in Burma wait and wonder for peace.

In this land my relatives and I have lived, we have known too much fear. It is time to reveal the fear. Help spread the fight for peace in Burma ... This is the untold Burmese story.

Following the steps of Subcomandante Marcos

SAN MIGÜEL, Mexico — The delegation representing the Zapatistas leaves a small stone church before heading to the negotiating table in San Miguel, a village west of Ocosingo, in the state Chiapas, April 9. Government and Zapatista negotiators met Sunday to set a time, place and agenda for talks aimed at ending the 16 month uprising as well as the six decades rule of the Institutional Revolutionary Party. Neither Sub Comandante Marcos or Mexican Secretary of State Esteban Moctezuma were present at Sunday's talks.

Narrow visions: the case of the Third World

Hernán Rozemberg

The Third World. El Tercer Mundo. Le Tiers Monde. Three different languages, all indicating an equal meaning to each of the three words — and one could keep easily keep going. But what is really behind those three words, at least from our perspective over here, in this First World?

This is something that is perhaps overanalyzed by a given few, but most importantly, something that most people in what we know as the industrialized world, seldom even come to know at all. Why is this so? What is going to be postulated here is nothing new. It is the myth of what constitutes a big chunk of this planet. Now some of us cannot really speak from experience — although some of us seem to pretend to know this experience — so we must realistically attempt to stay within a set of boundaries, a set of limits from which we can work and not fool ourselves.

The story being referred to is no other but that which we learn everyday: Rwanda, El Salvador, Burma; Africa, Central America, South America, Southeast Asia, the Middle East. What do all this places have in common? Yes, they are in the Third World. So, one may ponder, what is after all this Third World? Still surprisingly to many, what is most overlooked and ignored, the Third World is no more than approximately 67 percent of the entire globe's land mass, making up more than 75 percent of its population.

Many have heard that while Whites may be a so-called majority in this country and in Europe (it is just coincidence that these two go together?), they are but a mere minority looking at it from a global perspective.

Although to some this may be an obviously known fact, one could dare say that a vast majority have never heard such a thing; in fact, in thinking about this, a certain feeling of fear, anxiety or a combination therefore, may begin to flow down their bodies. This a mere reality of this world.

The question then must be posed: why is it that so many people here, and in Europe (observe the coincidence once again) have absolutely no knowledge about such realities? But how about if people try to look into themselves and in the manner they have been brought up, what they have been indoctrinated with, in order to find such an answer? By way of this, one could begin to open doors to an entirely new set of knows that before Columbus "discovered America," those who we call Native Americans had been living here between 15,000 and 30,000 years before the "discovery?" If all we are shown by the mass media conglomerates, are the starving children in Ethiopia and the Sudan, the killings in Rwanda, El Salvador, Perú; the political repression in China, North Korea ... how could we ever think that these areas could be countries inhabited by human beings?

Most do not even care to know: as long as we have our own individual parcel of "happiness" (how happy we then really are becomes an entirely different question in and of itself), we do not care to know that perhaps all those dead people in Rwanda have much in connection with the legacies of European colonialism; or that in Chile or Panamá or Nicaragua not only local civilians but even U.S. citizens there present were killed by U.S.–trained and U.S.–backed military forces.

The attitude is basically one recalling James Mill's utilitarianism, where the most happiness for the most people in society is the underlying goal we should be striving for — most people, one should realize, in the sense of those people who go along with the status quo, who are more than happy to say nothing or ask nothing as long as they are "getting theirs." Third World inhabitants never got a say as to formulating their own theory of utilitarianism.

One may say that Europeans and North Americans, as history has it, have been simply stronger that the rest. To be sure, this cannot be denied, materialistically speaking; however, also history has it, every great power has eventually gone down. If our roles as university students is to learn as much as possible about everything we can get our hands on, how about we put this into practice — how about beginning to learn about what we know the least?

A Prophecy: The Great Islamic State

Syed Raza

The world of Islam extends from the West coast of Africa to the remote corners of the Far East, with its more then 800 million people, its millions of square miles of territory principally in Africa and Asia, its dozens of societies, states, histories, geographies and cultures. It is a civilization which has been dormant for more than 200 years. In its greater era, the Islamic empire covered Spain, Southern France, North Africa, The Middle East, India, Central Asia, parts of Eastern Europe and Asia Minor.

Like much of the post colonial world, islamic nations do not belong to the industrialized group of nations. It has been regarded as falling within the purview of "development perspectives," which is another way of saying that Islamic societies were considered for at least three decades to be in need of "modernization." And ever since, Western nations have felt that it is their sacred duty to interfere in the affairs of the Islamic nations.

When the West has been unsuccessful in convincing these governments to follow their orders, it has branded them as terrorist states and isolated them from the so called "World community." Probably the only reason why the West is interested in the Middle East is only because of the oil reserves. The West has always had a grudge against the Islamic world and has always passed biased decisions against the Islamic nations.

The Pressler amendment, for example, is a U.S. law which states that the United States should cut of all financial and military aid to any country which, it feels, possesses nuclear or atomic weapons. The Islamic Republic of Pakistan has been targeted by this amendment since 1990, for the United States believes that Pakistan is developing potential nuclear carrying missiles and weapons. Surprisingly, neighboring India which "officially" exploded an atomic device in 1974 is granted U.S. military aid every year. The same goes for the non–Islamic states of Israel and South Africa, although both officially possess nuclear bombs but no Pressler amendment is imposed on either one of these states.

Why the United States approached Pakistan with this attitude remains a question, for if they thought that this will stop Pakistan from developing a nuclear device then they are sadly mistaken. Pakistan has tried to develop a nuclear device for its own defense because its next door neighbor India has a nuclear device. These biased actions only led the Muslim masses of Pakistan to believe that there one time ally had abandoned them and the Pakistanis turned towards other Islamic states like Iran and anti-U.S. China for support. The United States has now realized the effects of Its actions and is now striving to normalize relations between Pakistan and itself, as reflected by the recent visit of the first lady of the United States.

It has left the Muslims thinking as to why the allies got so actively involved in the Iraqi–Kuwaiti crisis. As to why the American–led United Nations has failed to impose sanctions on India, for war just to replace their aging NATO arsenal and kill a few hundred thousand Arabs, all on Arab expenses. So great were the expenses of this war that for the first time in history Saudi Arabia was in debt, for a war that the allies fought against a Muslim Arab nation! And the ego boosting part is the best — what better way to boost your ego then to go up against one nation with 40 nations behind you, what a heroic act!

Even though the Iraqis are still not totally forgiven by the Arab world, now the Arabs are starting to feel for them.

Next comes the case of the Afghan conflict. When the cold war was on, the United States rushed to the aid of the Afghans, provided them with arms and ammunition, but as soon as the Soviets left, so did the United States. They left an Afghanistan which had been totally destroyed by the bloody war fought between the Americans and the Russians. They did not care as to what would happen to their Afghan allies. They left the Afghans to fight it out amongst themselves (so that excess arms are destroyed) but after more then two years of civil war there is a clear winner.

The force which is the victorious one is known as the Talibans (Afghan students of religion from Pakistan). These young warriors are sick of the war and have amazingly conquered much of Afghanistan in less than a year. Even the United States is amazed at the victories of the Talibans. They have the full support of the Afghan citizens and their ultimate goal is to make Afghanistan into a full fledged Islamic state, just like Iran.

The United States abandoned the Afghanis and Pakistanis only to find them united against the West. The leaders of the Talibans declared in Herat that they would like to see a united Pakistan, Afghanistan, newly declared independent Islamic nations of Central Asia, and the Middle East, all under the glorious crescent of Islam. Considering the post– Gulf War feelings of the Arabs such an effort would not be difficult, as for the Pakistanis and Iranians, they have already approved it. And if you consider the Central Asian republics, they are in dire need of support, both financially and military, and this will easily be achieved by merging with the oil rich Arab states. This unification occurs then surely other Islamic states are to follow.

In total there would be close to 52 states, all under the green flag of Islam. The nightmare that has haunted the West for centuries might come true, they might be up against the same armies as were the crusaders. And all of this will go to the credit of the West, for had they not interfered in our affairs and shown their hostile attitude then the Islamic states, today, would have not even think of uniting. Nobody knows whether this unification will actually take place, for it is still too early to predict any possible outcome.

Far away in the star lit skies, the crescent prepares to shine again.

Guys And Dolls delights crowd

Classic musical shines despite dull sets; chorus exceptional

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

GUYS AND DOLLS
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
April 9

Big League Theatrical Productions performed an entertaining rendition of Damon Runyon's Guys and Dolls last Sunday. The one time only showing of the musical fable enchanted a full house with dashing gamblers, plucky chorus girls and upbeat songs.

The musical is set in Runyonland, a strip of New York City's Broadway area. The opening scene displayed a busy sidewalk full of society people, sailors, news boys, policemen and pick pockets. The bright colors of the chorus and the comical dance number helped set the tone for the performance.

The light hearted mêlée is broken up when sister Sarah Brown and her band of soul-saving missionaries begin to preach about sin, degradation and turning back to the path of righteousness. Enter Nathan Detroit, a tough talking gambler who runs the area's oldest floating crap game in the city, much to the chagrin of his fiancée, Miss Adelaide, who has been waiting to walk down the aisle for the past 14 years.

He bets Sky Masterson $1,000 that he can't get Sarah to go to Havana. Sky, named so because that's how high he wagers, takes the bet and sets off to seduce a missionary. On the whole, the musical was filled with an energetic cast that worked well with each other.

"I Know," a duet between Sarah (Jen Little) and Sky (Tim Mathes) had the actress singing an aria and a camp fire song at the same time. "The Crap Shooter's Dance" which proceeded the famous "Luck be a Lady" was full of energy while the latter came off dull in comparison, as if the cast was tired out.

However, "Sit Down Your Rocking the Boat" really captured the essence of the musical with the number garnering a thunderous applause along with "Sue Me," a duet between Nathan and Adelaide.

Also "Adelaide Lament" sounded very clear with Erika Greene sticking within the song's range. Other exceptional performances by the cast were Tim Salamandyk as Nicely- Nicely Johnson, Chris Dell'Armo as Benny South Street and Nicholas Rohlfing as Harry the Horse. All were perfect as Nathan's trusted cohorts and fellow gamblers.

While the musical excelled in the performance category, the scenery was a bit of a letdown. The creator was obviously aiming for a more abstract look, but it came off looking sloppy. The backdrop of a deserted street had curved buildings, looking as if they were about to topple onto the unsuspecting actors.

The backdrop of the sewer looked more like the worm hole in "Deep Space Nine" then a cavernous pipe. However, the scene in Havana captured the mood of the place perfectly with as realistic full moon and sultry atmosphere that made you believed Sky and Sarah were falling in love. The scenes that were set in The Hot Box were also well done, capturing the essence of a smoky dance club perfectly.

All and all Guys and Dolls delivered what it promised and left the audience with memories of a snappy musical.

Annual concert based on book

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

The 26th Annual Concert of Music for Percussion Instruments will be housed in Bowker Auditorium, April 12 at 8 p.m. As usual this year's concert promises to be different and unusual.

The musical program will be based in Nite of the Bocor, a text written in 1976 by Owen Clark. It will be narrated by Professors Horace Clarence Boyer and Dorothy Ornest. To highlight the drama of the vent, their voices will never rise above a whisper.

The book depicts the mental battle and verbal pleas of a woman who is guarding a grave against the Bocor. The Bocor are evil sorcerers, who in the voodoo religion, have the power to raise the dead.

To guard against these evil sorcerers the dead are buried with elaborate rituals. Often the corpses are buried beside a well-travelled road and the eyes, ears and nose of the corpse are sealed. For added protective measure, the grave is covered with stones.

Professor Peter Tanner was the concert director and initiator of the first concert which took place in 1969. This year he has put together a unique program which will include the University of Massachusetts' Trombone Choir and the Percussion Ensemble. The ensemble, conducted by Professor David Sporny, will team up with the choir to play a 1974 Rayburn Wright piece, "Interfaces I."

Another promising highlight will be the American premiere of Czech composer Jan Jirasek's new original composition, "Bread and Circuses."

Jirasek was born in 1955 in Eastern Bohemia and has created musical pieces that have been performed in France, Czechoslovakia, Germany and Spain. His pieces have also been performed in New York, San Francisco and Philadelphia.

"Bread and Circuses" originality comes from the unusual combination of swishing, whistling and human voices. This is achieved by four of the players whirling flexible tubing above their heads. The concert will be something truly unique and exciting. It is an excellent way for students and Valley residence to experience a different genre of music created by some very untraditional instruments.

The 26th Annual Concert for Percussion Instruments will take place at Bowker Auditorium on April 12 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $6 general, $3 students, senior citizens and children under 12; free for UMass students with valid I.D. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office and at the door on the evening of the performance.

Method Man tells tales of street life

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

Rap shows are few and far between in the Valley, so Wednesday night is sure to be a welcomed event when University Productions and Concerts (UPC) presents Method Man, The Roots and Channel Live at the Student Union Ballroom.

Method Man is touring in support of his debut album, TICAL, on which he draws from his own life on the streets of New York to provide an account of the struggles he has experienced. Method Man grew up in poverty after leaving home when he was very young. He attributes hip-hop and the culture surrounding it to keeping his spirits up during the hard times.

TICAL was produced by Rakim of Eric B. and Rakim fame which was special for Method Man because Rakim (now going by the name Rza) was a major catalyst in opening up his eyes to the essence of rap.

The Roots stray from the typical mold of rap acts as they use drums, bass and lyrics to attain grooves that have drawn attention from all over the globe.

The group's own roots stem from drummer Alunir-Khalib Thompson and Tariq Trotter's days playing in Philadelphia and often utilizing anything they could strike as a substitute for percussion. Due to their humble beginnings, DJ equipment was financially out of reach, and therefore samples have never played a role in their music.

The band now consists of Trotter and Malik B. busting out the rhymes, Thompson on drums and Leonard Hubbard on bass. The Roots recently released their major label debut, Do You Want More?!!??! on Geffen.

Opening the show will be the New Jersey based rap duo Channel Live, whose album on Capitol Records, Station Identification, has garnered acclaim from critics and fellow rappers like KRS-One.

The duo is made up of Tuffy and Hakim, who tackle issues that often are ignored by many of the copycat rappers on the scene today. The pair are attempting to bring back some of the more complex and syncopated rapping that flourished due to groups such as Boogie Down Productions and 3rd Bass.

Hakim and Tuffy had been on the scene for a while working as dancers for Naughty by Nature before KRS-One heard their demo and decided to help promote them.

Method Man will perform with guests The Roots and Channel Live on April 12 at 7:30 p.m. Tickets are available at Tix Unlimited, For The Record, Northampton Box Office and Strawberries for $12/UMass students and $15 for the general public. For more information contact UPC at 545-2892.

Writer urges fan boycott

By Doug Tucker
Associated Press

HAINES CITY, Fla. — A newspaper columnist's plea for a fan boycott of the Kansas City Royals' home opener is getting on the nerves of some of the players.

Jason Whitlock, a columnist for The Kansas City Star, has written several columns urging fans to skip the April 26 opener against Baltimore. Whitlock estimated he's received 1,000 phone calls in the past week, almost all supporting the boycott.

Art Brisbane, the Star's vice president and editor, said Whitlock's views aren't necessarily those of the newspaper.

"The organization wants nothing more than to see a successful baseball organization here in perpetuity, but at the same time we want to see our columnists let 'er rip," Brisbane said.

Whitlock opposes a season-long strike, but says he thinks fans "need an opportunity to vent." He's volunteered to organize a rally for disaffected fans somewhere outside Kauffman Stadium on opening day.

Third baseman Gary Gaetti said he didn't think a boycott would affect the players at all. But designated hitter Bob Hamelin disagreed.

"I'd hate to see it," said Hamelin, the 1994 American League Rookie of the Year. "I wish it wouldn't happen. But the fans have the right if that's what they choose to do."

Royals reliever Jeff Montgomery says there may be a danger in fans staying away.

"I'd say if you want to do it, then do it, knowing that there's a risk you're running that baseball may leave you," he said. "If that's a risk you're willing to take, fine. If not, give us your support and try to keep the team successful."

Montgomery, however, once was on the other side. Growing up in Wellston, Ohio, about 100 miles east of Cincinnati, he admits he vowed never to go to another game when big leaguers went on strike during his high school days in 1981.

Kansas City residents figure they have more reasons than most to be unhappy. After enduring the 232-day strike, they saw their cash-strapped club dump their best pitcher and best outfielder, Cy Young winner David Cone and Brian McRae, for minor leaguers in a pure payroll purge.

doomed to a second round exit. Bourque just doesn't have the reserves to play at full throttle deep into the year, though it will be interesting to see if the abridged regular season has increased his mileage.

However, even if Bourque's not of gas, neither will be the bruising opponents that will surely batter Bourque without mercy, as the Sabres and Devils did.

As for the Whale, Pat Verbeek is practically forgotten in InsuranceLand, but so is Glen Featherstone, obtained in exchange from the Rangers.

The league tarred the Feather with a four game suspension for throwing his helmet at an usher at Buffalo's Aud. But the next time the Feather goes to a game there, he may be out of uniform, and that usher should sit him where he belongs: the cheap seats.

third birdie in four holes to give him an even-par 72 for the day. Woods pumped his fist in the air to mark the moment.

The champions' locker room is a place where Woods hopes to have a stall of his own some day. He even snuck in there at night when no one was around.

"Just give me a few years and lot of hard work," he said.

Woods is cautious around the media, but he's certainly conscious of publicity, handing out copies of his letter thanking the tournament staff for their hospitality during his week in Augusta.

"Your tournament will always hold a special spot in my heart as the place where I made my first PGA cut, and at a major yet!" Woods wrote. "It is here that I left my youth behind and became a man."

Earl Woods, Tiger's father and mentor, agreed with that assessment.

"It was a fantastic experience," the elder Woods said. "The young man grew, matured. He was just soaking up information like a sponge out there all week long. I think he's going to be right on from now on."

The sports staff will be meeting tonight at 6:30 p.m., as opposed to the 7 p.m. that was listed in yesterday's paper. Agassi overtakes Sampras

By Hal Bock
Associated Press

Andre Agassi's push to the top began last July at the Canadian Open when he was stuck at No. 20, an imposing 4,061 points behind leader Pete Sampras.

In those days, Agassi was viewed as a tennis novelty, a ponytailed showman who had only occasionally delivered on his promise. It was an image that was about to change drastically.

Agassi won that tournament, touching off a sensational stretch during which he won six more events in the next eight months, including two Grand Slams — the U.S. Open and Australian Open.

On Monday, his ponytail long gone, Agassi got the payoff, moving past Sampras to claim the No. 1 ranking on the ATP computer for the first time in his career.

He becomes just the 12th player in the 22-year history of men's computer rankings to hold No. 1 and ends Sampras' 82-week grip on the top spot. Sampras held it for 101 of the last 104 weeks, his sting interrupted only by Jim Courier for three weeks from Aug. 23-Sept. 13, 1993.

During his march to the top, Agassi had a 55-6 match record, including 26-2 this season. He piled up points against the best players in tennis, going 17-3 against opponents in the Top 10 since winning the Canadian.

Over the same period, Sampras went 34-9 with three titles and two second-place finishes. He won the year-end championship in Frankfurt, Germany, beating Agassi in the semi-finals, and finished the year with a tour-high 10 titles.

The lead is a mere 187 points as the rivals go to work this week in separate tournaments — Agassi in Tokyo and Sampras in Spain.

Both were well aware of the change at the top and its significance.

By the time I got up to my room I forgot what part it was.

So, I headed back down, but halfway down I forgot what it was that I was working on in the first place.

I turned around and headed back up hoping when I got to my room I'd remember what I was doing originally. In fact, at that point I forgot whether I was supposed to be going up or down the steps.

I couldn't remember, so I headed back down to the kitchen, had lunch and called it a day.

I'm too young for this.

Clarke expected to attend UMass

Bronx guard can officially sign letter of intent tomorrow

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Backcourt help appears to be on the way for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team, as Charlton Clarke, a 6–foot 3–inch guard from the Bronx, N.Y. is expected to announce that he plans to attend UMass next year, according to sources.

Tomorrow is the day in which players can officially sign letters of intent for men's basketball.

Clarke, who can play at either guard spot, has reportedly been high on the Massachusetts wish list throughout the year. He skyrocketed to the top of the Minutemen's list when Wayne Turner, who UMass had also been recruiting, decided to attend Kentucky.

Clarke is averaging more than 26 points per game while playing for St. Raymond's under coach Gary Decesare, who also coached current Minuteman Dana Dingle.

The Bronx native drew praise from ESPN commentator Dick Vitale for both his skills and his personality when ESPN broadcast the annual Magic's Roundball Classic, a high school all–star game created by former NBA star Magic Johnson.

While Clarke's shooting appeared to be off in the contest, he displayed passing skills and ability to take the ball to the basket.

The decision would spurn Florida and Connecticut, also heavily recruiting Clarke.

Clarke has reportedly already achieved the necessary 700 score on his SAT, which would make him eligible to play next season as a freshman.

Clarke would join juniors–to–be Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso, who will be returning in the UMass backcourt. The status of the other guard, Andre Burks (currently suspended), is unknown pending the outcome of his domestic assault and battery charges.

Massachusetts will likely add another freshman guard to the roster as well. The Minutemen are still in the running for Terrell Stokes, a point guard from Simon Gratz High School in Philadelphia, the same school that Rasheed Wallace and Aaron McKie attended.

Stokes is also being recruited by Maryland and Syracuse, and is expected to make his decision soon.

If Stokes slips by UMass, the Minutemen will likely sign Preston Murphy, a 6–foot 2–inch guard that was recently named first team all–state in Michigan. Murphy, a point guard from Nouvel Catholic in Saginaw, Mich., is considered by many to be a sleeper. He has expressed interest in coming to UMass next year, but will attend Rhode Island if the Minutemen pass him by.

Another New York high school product, Jameel Watkins, was in Amherst for a recruiting visit this weekend. The 6– foot 9–inch power forward will reportedly decide between UMass, Cincinnati and West Virginia.

Scheduling rumors: The most recent rumor for next year has Massachusetts playing Connecticut in the Great Eight Tournament next fall. The tournament reportedly may not match up the participants with the same teams they played during the NCAA tournament, so the New England rivals may finally square off ... There is also speculation that UMass will play Wake Forest in the Mullins Center ... Currently, the Minutemen are expected to play Georgia Tech (Meadowlands), Memphis State (Centrum) and will also play in the Rainbow Classic in Hawaii.

Women's track still unbeaten after defeating BC and BU

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

Amid temperatures in the low 30s and with snow falling heavily at times, Saturday was a great day for hockey.

It was also a great day for an indoor track meet, but the undefeated University of Massachusetts women's track team (6–0) instead competed outdoors, where they defeated cross–state rivals Boston College and Boston University on a frosty Llewelyn Derby Track. The Minutewomen amassed 83 points, topping the Eagles' 70 and the Terriers' 21 as they continued their winning ways.

"I was quite pleased overall," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "I thought that despite the weather, the women were tough, tenacious and competitive. When I saw that Rosie Bryan and Katie Greenia were out, and with Kelly [Liljeblad] being as flat as she was, I thought there was no way to win. The field events helped pull us up."

Christie Martin and Janey Meeks both captured a pair of field events for UMass. Martin qualified for the ECAC Championships with a 152' 7" hammer throw, which shattered her previous personal best distance. Martin won the hammer by an astounding 26' 8" over the second place finisher, UMass' Shana Mitchell. Completing her strong performance, Martin also won the shot put (40' 3–1/4"), and placed third in the discus (102' 7").

Meeks continued a stellar season by winning both the high jump and triple jump titles with leaps of 5' 2–1/4" and 38 feet respectively. Meeks has qualified for the New England Championships in each event.

Sophomore Heather Brown turned in the highlight of the afternoon as she broke a seven–year–old school record with her 161' 3" javelin throw. The North Kingston, R.I. native, has already provisionally qualified for the 1995 NCAA Championships to be held May 31 through June 3 in Knoxville, Tenn.

"Heather Brown and Christie Martin had the best throws of their careers," LaFreniere said. "How can they do that in that kind of miserable weather? [Brown's] 161' 3" is fantastic."

Nicole Roberts won a thrilling 400 meters in 58.8 seconds. Trailing for most of the race, Roberts, made a sprint for the finish during the final 100 meters and caught BC's Mary Brady just before the finish line, beating her by just one– tenth of a second. Roberts also ran the final leg of the 4 x 100 relay, where the Minutewomen placed second, just two– tenths of a second behind the Eagles.

Anya Forrest, who ran the first leg of that race, won the 100 meter hurdles in 15.1 seconds and also placed second in both the 100 meters and 200 meters.

Freshman Rebecca Donaghue had a solid day, as she took the 800 meters in 2:15.9, while running the final leg of the 4 x 400 relay team.

Kelly Liljeblad was not her usual self, though. Liljeblad placed an uncharacteristic third in the 1500 meters and second in the 300 meters, events that she usually dominates.

The Minutewomen will return to action this Saturday at noon, as they host Holy Cross, Hartford, Providence College, Iona and the UMass–Lowell River Hawks at Derby Track. Central Connecticut was also supposed to attend the meet, but had to cancel yesterday afternoon.

Women's tennis successful in tournament

By Mike Brown
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's tennis team participated in the Mount St. Mary's College Spring Invitational tournament this past weekend and exited on a positive note.

The tournament featured players from host Mt. St. Mary's, St. John's, Pace, Connecticut and Massachusetts.

The five teams were considered evenly matched and served as a good change of pace for the Minutewomen, who after losing to regional powers such as Seton Hall and Cornell, were expected to fare well.

"This tournament is our level," UMass coach Judy Dixon said prior to the weekend. "There are no teams much better than us and no teams much worse than us."

UMass was led by captain Liesl Sitton, who emerged as the winner of the championship singles bracket. Sitton won in impressive fashion, defeating UConn's Tara Bogota 6–0, 6–0, Pace's Julie Ramos 6–1, 6–0, and St. John's Maria Rapchinski in the final match 6–1, 6–2.

Sitton, last year's New England Champion, had been battling a confidence problem in recent matches. This tournament proved to be a breakthrough for the UMass star.

"Liesl played really well," teammate Noelle Orsini said. "Her confidence level is definitely back."

"Liesl did what she had to do," added teammate Liz Durant. "They were easy wins for her."

Assistant coach Dan Rosenberg was most pleased with Sitton's performance. He believes that her timing could not be better with the Atlantic 10 tournament next week.

"Liesl is peaking at the right time for the A–10s," Rosenberg said. "She played in a zone, her game was clicking on all cylinders."

Other first round victories for the Minutewomen in the championship singles were from Durant, who won 7–5, 6–1, Orsini (6–0, 6–2), and UMass exchange student Catalina Mejia, who defeated the eventual consolation singles winner Mona Eek, 6–3, 1–6, 6–2. The three were all handed second round losses in the bracket.

St. John's Eek ironically faced Mejia again in the consolation finals before capturing the victory 6–2, 6–4. Eek was the highest–ranked player in the tournament with UMass' Sitton seeded second. Mejia's defeat of Eek in the first round of the championship bracket not only smoothed Sitton's path to victory, but was also a tribute to her game.

Woods succeeds in first Masters this weekend

By Paul Newberry
Associated Press

AUGUSTA, Ga. — So, Tiger Woods, you've just played in your first Masters at age 19. What are you going do now?

Go to Disney World?

Sorry, there's no time for that kind of revelry. Not when he had to make a 9 a.m. history class today.

"The only thing that will be really tough is I missed the first week of spring quarter being here," said the Stanford freshman, who completed his first Masters Sunday with his third even–par round and a respectable 5–over 293 total. "I have to catch up in the next few days."

Woods had the lowest score of any amateur in the tournament. Of course, that was never in doubt since he was the only amateur who even made the cut.

"It has been very memorable because I played extremely well," said Woods, who last August became the youngest U.S. Amateur champion ever at age 18. "Coming out of this tournament, I feel very confident and very positive with the way I played."

Just as he had been all week, Woods was bedeviled only by his iron play. His booming drives were straight and as long as anybody in the field, and he chipped and putted with the touch of a veteran. But his approach shots consistently sailed over the green, turning birdies into pars, pars into bogeys.

Tiger, it turned out, was simply too strong for his own good.

"I just didn't hit my irons well," he said. Actually, "I hit them well, but I didn't hit them the right distance."

Down the stretch, though, Woods displayed the all-around game that figures to bring him back to Augusta again and again.

At the par-5 15th hole, he drove over the green in two shots, chipped up to within 2 feet of the cup and tapped in for birdie. At the par-3 16th, he drained a 15-footer for another birdie, followed by a par at 17 in which he unleashed a huge drive and nifty approach to within 12 feet of the hole, but pulled his putt wide left.

At 18, his drive had the crowd "oohing" and "aahing," landing on a knoll atop the uphill fairway for a great look at the flag stick. His approach was exquisite, rolling back to within 12 feet of the cup. When his putt dropped into the cup for his

Montreal trades prove to be dumb & dumber

UNLV basketball proved titles can be won without brains, but the Montreal Canadiens won a good chunk of their 24 Stanley Cups with a goaltender who doubled as a lawyer.

But Les Habitants are new subscribers to a more American trend of "dumbing down," evidenced by their self–imposed erosion of a fine defense. Which I guess is permissible when your All–World goalie is in the midst of his worst season.

The Canadiens did it again. One would think they learned their lesson from the regrettable Mark Recchi acquisition, so cleverly expressed by an Ellston cartoon in The Hockey News picturing GM Serge Savard eating ashes left by a backfiring cannon.

Since Blockbuster I did nothing to solidify Montreal's playoff prospects, on the eve of the trading deadline Blockbuster II saw Kirk Muller and Matthew Schneider pack their backs for Long Island in exchange for Pierre Turgeon and Vladimir Malakhov.

A pair of two-way players for a pair of offense only players. The saying rings true: those who forget history are doomed to repeat it.

Canadiens coach Jacques Demers envisions Turgeon, Recchi and Vincent Damphousse forming a line that rivals Philadelphia's Erle Lindros–Mikael Renberg–John LeClair (thanks, Serge) trio.

Alas, it's the Flyers who have Erle Desjardins (thanks again, Serge) backing that line, while the Canadiens are left without their former two best stay–at–home defensemen. That's got to make Patrick Roy pretty happy; a struggling goalie needs thinner defense like Theo Fleury needs a diet.

It seems nothing can rescue Chicago's season with Jeremy Roenick lost, but acquiring Denis Savard and Gerald Diduck won't hurt. Spin–o–rama spins a little slower than he did in his first Windy City whirl, but he can still score. And Diduck gives the Hawks even greater defensive depth.

The Islanders may be one of the first teams to decline an invite to the no–jacket–required playoffs, so shipping Benoit Hogue to Toronto for junior league goalie Eric Fichaud made good sense. Goaltending prospects are the surest thing these days, and Fitch is the best of his class.

With Pat LaFontaine years removed and Turgeon now gone as well, the Isle needs an attraction, and this Quebec–bred phenom may well be it very soon.

Speaking of Francophones, did anyone catch the J.C. Bergeron Show, playing for one night only (Sunday) at the Hartford Civic Center? If Don Beaupre's clean sheet earlier this year was the Sears Tower, then this 23 save, 3–0 job on the Whalers was the Empire State Building.

And I can't think of a more meat and potatoes, keep it simple team that deserves clutching and grabbing, shadowing and dirty trick playing Gaetan Duchesne more than the Florida Panthers.

Now for the teams that lay dormant: can you guess where this list begins? As the Bruins back-up, Craig Billington's numbers should shift back to what they were in the New Jersey nets two years ago, but is there any doubt the Lach Net Monster will be Boston's No. 1 when it's best of seven?

The Bruins had a lot of work to do, but Harry Sinden gets an incomplete on his report card. One really has to feel for Ray Bourque.

First, in a rare victory for ownership, he lost his arbitration case and accepted a poorer contract. Then he wins the Norris Trophy. Now, he faces the grim fate of endless vicious checks to be dealt by the Bruins' playoff foes. Bourque's just hoping it's not Buffalo or Buffalo, which wore out Bourque and retired the Black and Gold in 1995 and 1994, respectively.

With no new aid on the blueline or at forward, the Bruins are

UMass supported at state capitol

By Marc V. Mombourquette
Collegian Correspondent

BOSTON — Yesterday at the Third Annual University of Massachusetts Statehouse Day, 400 students, faculty and alumni from the University's five campuses and state colleges gathered to meet with State Representatives and Senators to discuss the needs of the system.

85 members of the Amherst campus boarded a bus bound for the Statehouse early yesterday morning. Upon arrival, other representatives from the state colleges and universities gathered to perform in a mass lobbying campaign, targeting members of the Senate and House of Representatives Ways and Means Committee. The House is currently reviewing their proposed budgets.

Tim Milmore, a first–time student lobbyist decided to join the group after see many posters advertising the free event and had a brief presentation before a class.

"This was the only school that I could afford and to see tuition and fees increase would really hurt the students. It's important for these elected officials to see us and know that this is important to us," said Milmore.

The House Ways and Means Committee Budget, which is being heavily debated this week, calls for a $30 million increase in higher education funding.

Weld proposes budget

Gov. William F. Weld's proposed budget would eliminate $20 million from the public higher education budget, raising tuition and fees on the Amherst campus by as much as $268.

Currently, Massachusetts is ranked 43rd in the nation in funds spent per student on public higher education and UMass Amherst is now ranked the second most expensive public university in the nation.

Since 1988, tuition and fees have increased by 121 percent and even though funding for the University has increased modestly in the past three years, funding for UMass Amherst has not reached the 1988 level.

University President Michael K. Hooker spoke on Weld and the needs of the University system to solicit more private donations to offset the growing costs of the University.

Weld has set aside $10 million, promising it for UMass if they can raise the same amount in private donations.

He also said "This is a defining moment for UMass, and the present fund–raising can assist in the definition." He went further to state "that if [the University of California, Berkeley] can be a Stanford with a subsidy then there is no reason why UMass can't be a Harvard with a subsidy."

Senate President William Bulger (D, Boston) followed Weld, pleading his case before the excited crowd. Bulger is credited with aiding with the University request for a $15 million increase.

Bulger began by grimly commenting on the prospects of an increase to the public higher education budget.

"Revenues aren't coming in as usual, so you can't make rash promises," he said.

He then paused and turned to look towards "Forrest Gump" or "Big Red" as he affectionately calls Weld and declared "On the other hand, I think we can afford it" which was quickly followed by two minutes of boisterous applause from the crowd of more than 400.

According to Ken Lemanski, director of government relations for the University, this push for appropriations is the first step in a long process.

He said that the president's office will also attempt to tackle other issues such as a capital outlay program which would bring much needed repairs to the various campuses, revisions in the employee contracts and appropriations for a "much needed" faculty raise.

The state's budget for higher education has increased in each of the last three years, but still is below 1988 levels.

Colleges and universities suffered drastic funding cuts from 1988 to 1992. In fiscal 1995, which ends June 30, higher education spending totaled about $707 million.

Series to look at sex health

Programs to educate on different aspects of GLB issues

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Gay, lesbian, and bisexual students at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst will have the opportunity to discuss and explore sexual health through a series of programs sponsored by Health Education.

The series begins tonight at 7 p.m. with "Living and Loving in the 90s" and "Man to Man." Both workshops will be held on the first floor of Mary Lyon Residence Hall.

Safer sex, sexual health and HIV/sexually transmitted disease prevention are important issues for people of all sexual orientations, said Health Educator Debra Edelman.

However, said Paul Entis, societal homophobia often prevents GLB people from accessing information that is sensitive to their needs.

With tonight's workshops, he said, "[Health Education wants] to create an atmosphere where people can discuss a part of their life that isn't often discussed openly or positively."

Entis is outreach coordinator for Health Education and said that he has been working to educate GLB people about their sexual health.

"Living and Loving in the 90s" and "Man to Man" are designed to allow GLB students to ask questions about sex in a confidential and safe atmosphere, Entis said.

When it comes to sex, small groups are much more effective educators than general education, said Derek Cash.

Cash is pursuing a Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration in HIV / AIDS Education and will co–facilitate "Man to Man" with Entis. Cash has a part–time position with AIDS Action — Boston.

Lesbian and bisexual women at risk

Many lesbian and bisexual women are ignorant about their sexual health, said Edelman, who will facilitate "Living and Loving in the 90s."

Some college–age lesbians believe that because they have only had sex with other women, they do not have to pay attention to their sexual health, Edelman said.

The Greater Haverhill Clothesline Project presented an exhibit detailing violence against women on various t–shirts at last weekend's "Rally for Women's Lives" in Washington, D.C.

Project portrays victims of violence

By Marian Rozanski
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON — The Greater Haverhill Clothesline Project presented a display at "The Rally For Women's Lives" in Washington, D.C. this weekend.

The project, originated by the Cape Cod Women's Agenda out of Hyannis in October 1990, visually portrays violence perpetrated against women. T–shirts are hung shoulder to shoulder on a clothesline, each describing the personal stories of victimized women and their families.

Each shirt represents a different aspect of abuse each woman or family has suffered from, by the use of a specific color–coding system.

White shirts represent women who have died violently. Red, orange and pink shirts represent women who have been raped or sexually assaulted. Blue and green shirts depict survivors of incest or child sexual abuse. Yellow and beige t–shirts illustrate battered and assaulted women, and purple or lavender shirts symbolize violence against lesbians.

The main goal of the Clothesline Project, said a flier, is to educate the community on growing statistics of women and families affected by the abuse of females in our society.

The number of t–shirts appearing on the clothesline has grown from 31 shirts in October of 1990, to 35,000 shirts in February of this year.

UMass to look at possibility of gen ed revisions

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is in the process of discussing revisions in general education curriculum requirements needed for graduation.

In light of the General Education Council meeting last Friday to discuss the University–mandated requirements, the Provost's office is in the early stages of what could ultimately be big plans.

According to John Jenkins, chair of the Council, the general education requirements are now being evaluated during the Council's monthly meetings.

Amy Bidne, a freshman biology major, said she is taking her requirements because they are requirements.

"They are a repeat of the things I learned in high school, just a little more in–depth," Bidne said. "They're a basic refreshment of general topics."

Diversity a key component

According to Jenkins, one of the University's driving points in requiring the general education curriculum is to emphasize a diverse background that will enrich all graduates.

When students graduate from UMass, their undergraduate education typically consists of one–third of general education courses, Jenkins said. These areas of study include writing, cultural diversity, analytical thinking, in addition to disciplines other than the student's major.

Jim Hendrick, a senior microbiology major, said he has an "overall good impression" of the general education courses he has taken, yet questioned why fellow students take the courses.

"You can choose interesting classes," he said. "I don't think your average student would if they weren't forced to take different types of courses."

Gen eds increase awareness

One of the University's goals in instituting its general education curriculum is to increase awareness of cultures and interests that may not be directly connected with the students field of study, Jenkins said.

Some of the many University departments that offer general education courses are comparative literature, Judaic and Near Eastern Studies, computer science and Afro–American Studies.

Jeff Davis, a freshman political science major, said requirements enable undecided or undeclared students to survey a wide array of topics, as future plans are considered.

"In your first two years, you can think you want to go into one profession, but then you'll choose another," he said. "The general education curriculum allows students to explore many possibilities."

Student and faculty participation

The General Education Council, appointed by the Faculty Senate, consists of 22 members, Jenkins

Roxbury teen arraigned for UM assault incident

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — A Roxbury teenager was arraigned yesterday on a number of charges including assault and battery and two civil rights violations for an incident earlier this semester at the University of Massachusetts.

Corey John Driscoll, 18, pled not guilty in Hampshire County Superior Court to charges of Larceny of property under $250, assault and battery by dangerous weapon (a shod foot), civil rights violation by bodily injury and a civil rights violation by intimidation.

Superior Court Judge Constance M. Sweeney set bail at $25,000 surety after setting a date for a review of indegency in which his financial status will determine if he will be appointed a lawyer.

Driscoll was allegedly involved in an incident on Feb. 9 in front of Memorial Hall in which he allegedly struck and kicked another person several times and then stole the victim's jacket, according to police documents.

Driscoll also allegedly made racial remarks while attacking the victim, police said.

In relation, the UMass police are currently looking for an individual who was on a South Amherst PVTA bus on the night of Feb. 9 at approximately 8:24 p.m. An incident occurred in which someone exiting the bus bumped into another individual at the GRC stop and a verbal confrontation with the two erupted.

There was no physical confrontation, but police said they are hoping anyone who was involved may be able to help with the case.

Individuals who might have information in the alleged incident are asked to contact the UMass detectives at 545– 0893. All information will be kept confidential, police said.

A pre–trial date for Driscoll has been set for May 4.

Vandalism found at home, office of Smith professor

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Police are currently investigating the vandalism of a Smith College professor's home and office earlier this week.

Shortly after professor Seymour Itzkoff was notified of graffiti at his office Monday morning, he discovered the words "Beware racist" spray painted on the outside of his house.

His garage door had the message, "Your words will follow you" painted on it, as well.

Itzkoff, a professor of education and child study, has been the target of past student protests in disapproval of his studies and beliefs on the link between genetics and intelligence.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian received a letter from the Citizens United in the Healing of Racism, claiming that they were responsible for the vandalism.

The Collegian faxed the letter over to Smith and, according to Smith Spokesperson Stacey Schmeidel, it has been forwarded to other College officials.

Itz' off's property was "chosen for direction" in an effort to challe[illegible] "institutionally sanctioned ra[illegible]," according to the letter.

It is unclear who the Citizens group is comprised of, or where they originated. The College had never heard of the group prior to the letter, Schmeidel said.

"The police are very involved in investigating this incident," Schmeidel said. Smith College, Northampton and Ashfield police are all working on the case.

Itzkoff has taught at Smith for 30 years, and studied the evolution of human intelligence for the past decade. The Decline of Intelligence in America: A Strategy for National Renewal is his most recently published book.

Itzkoff told police that he believes someone outside of the College is responsible for the vandalism.

Mary Maples Dunn, president of Smith, released a memo to the College community stating that someone had vandalized the hall outside of Itzkoff's office in Wright Hall with "offensive epithets," and damaged books in his personal library.

"This despicable act causes more than physical damage," Dunn wrote. "I am very discouraged when someone strikes such a blow to the civil discourse that is at the heart of academic institutions. This undermines freedom for all of us."

The Daily Hampshire Gazette contributed to this article.

said. Twelve are faculty members appointed by the senate, three undergraduate students are appointed by the Student Government Association and two are graduate student teaching assistants appointed by the Graduate Student Senate.

The remaining five are ex-officios, neither elected nor appointed, but they participate because of the position they hold, Jenkins said.

The General Education Council plans to meet for the last time this academic year on May 12, where they plan to primarily discuss the impact of the general education curriculum upon freshmen.

shirts

An Associated Press article reported that Denise Brown, sister of Nicole Brown Simpson, hung a white t-shirt covered with multi-colored hand prints and handwritten messages in honor of her sister.

One t-shirt from Nevada was made by an 8-year-old rape victim who wrote the words of her abuser "I will ruin you so no man will want you," followed by "You stole my innocence."

A project flier says the shirts aim to "bear witness to the survivors as well as the victims of the war against women;" "help with the healing process for people who have lost a loved one or are survivors of this violence;" "educate, document, and raise society's awareness of the extent of the problem of violence against women;" and "provide a nationwide network of support, encouragement and information for other communities starting their own Clothesline Projects."

Personal impact

The display attracted the attention of many of the rally attendees.

University of Massachusetts, Amherst senior, Felicitia Boisvert, said the t-shirt display was moving.

"It put actual people behind the numbers. You can't ignore their own words," she said.

Carl David Birman, a rape victim from Brooklyn, N.Y., reflected on the impact of the display.

"Some people have the potential to change, but a lot of people are going to die before anything changes— how do you get along with such monsters? Ultimately, it's about healing the monsters within you," said Birman.

He walked around the exhibit and added that, "the process of creating art and political expression is healing within itself," but pointed to the t-shirts and said, "This is like a portrait of hell."

GLB programs coming

Often these women go through four years of college without ever being examined by a gynecologist or finding out how to do a breast examination.

One of the reasons that these women are putting themselves in danger is because they mistakenly link membership to a "low risk" group to being at low risk, Edelman said. HIV / STD transmission is based on behavior, not on membership to any group.

A woman who identifies as a lesbian may sometimes have sex with men, but because lesbians have been labeled as a "low risk" group for HIV / STDs, she may believe she is safe.

However, no matter how an individual woman identifies herself, there are certain health issues that every woman should be aware of, Edelman stresses. Having a yearly gynecological exam is just as important for a lesbian as it is for a heterosexual woman.

"Living and Loving in the 90s" will give lesbian and bisexual women the chance to discuss and explore all of these issues, Edelman said. The workshop will include a presentation on women's health, an anonymous question- answer form, open discussion, and possibly a video.

Gay and bisexual men need to talk

Entis described "Man to Man" as a program for "men who are having sex with men and having to deal with the reality that AIDS and HIV have an impact [on sexual activity and sexual intimacy]."

Recent studies indicate that HIV infection is on the rise among young gay and bisexual men, Entis said. Health educators are starting to realize that "for safe sex to work totally [they] need people to practice it 100 percent of the time."

According to Entis, however, gay and bisexual men have little opportunity to discuss their questions, concerns, and experiences with safer sex. Many men want to know more but find it difficult to ask the questions that could save their lives, Entis said.

Safer sex and HIV / AIDS awareness have been "degayed" over the past ten years, said co-facilitator Cash. In effort to reduce the stigma attached to gay and bisexual men, health educators have stopped targeting them with their programs.

"Gay and bisexual men have been forgotten," Cash said.

"Man to Man" is designed to let these men ask one another questions and speak openly about their personal experiences with safe sex, both positive and negative.

"[The workshop] is about making young men care enough about themselves to protect themselves," Cash said.

"Man to Man" will include information relevant to a wide range of sexual practices, Cash said. These including condom usage, oral sex, men's health care, HIV transmission and testing.

Cash and Entis say they will answer any and all questions, including anonymous questions handed to them on pieces of paper.

More programs planned

Over the next few weeks, Entis said, Health Education is working with other University programs to reach GLB students through additional workshops and discussions.

On April 25, Health Education will co-sponsor a "Forum for GLB Students." Representatives will present information on GLB health services available through Health Services, Mental Health Services, Physical Education, Public Health, and other programs. The forum is co-sponsored by the Chancellor's Task Force for GLB Matters and the Program for GLB Concerns.

Two more programs, "Affirming Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Identities as an Undergraduate" and "Double Jeopardy" are scheduled for the fist week of May.

Prof discusses problem with ethnic labels

By Yinan Estrada
Collegian Correspondent

Ethnic labels like "Hispanic" obstruct Latin American peoples' ability to cultivate their own sense of individuality.

This idea was expressed by Suzanne Oboler, first Latino(a) Studies professor at the Department of American Civilization at Brown University. Her talk, "Rethinking Diversity: Race and the Shaping of 'Ethnic Identities' in Higher Education," provided the historical context under which labels such as Hispanic were fabricated.

Her talk took place on Monday, April 10, at the sixth floor lounge of Herter Hall. It was co-sponsored by the Social Thought and Political Economy Program, Latin American Studies, and the Department of Spanish and Portuguese.

According to Oboler, the term Hispanic was disseminated by state and federal agencies since 1970, referring to people of Latin American and Spanish descent, overlooking their diverse and multiracial composition.

Many Latinos born after this date resist this labeling because of its politico-cultural implications. Others fail to question it. The principal problem with labeling is that not only does it take from the Hispanic heritage, "what fits everybody," but that these generalizations are misleading, said Oboler.

We must be aware that the term Hispanic was fabricated to homogenize people from a vast number of Latin American countries under one term, said Oboler. Unfortunately there are many students and individuals measuring themselves along the line of what it means to be a Hispanic, she said. To be "Hispanic," one can not possibly be defined or explained in one word. Each individual carries their own experiences and cultural baggage.

The term Latino America itself is a French construction, which brings us to the question of who are we or what do people prefer to be identified as, Hispanics or Latinos. "Only you can determine this, because the historical context in which the question is asked changes from individual to individual," said Oboler.

Oboler points out that it is important to answer these questions at an individual level, but that, more importantly, the way resources are distributed in the United States require that the community come together.

A student at the lecture questioned to what extent is it possible to do without labels in a society as big as this one.

Oboler admitted that it would be impossible to do without labels in this society. But, she asks, "what does it matter?" The more important issue is recognizing what these labels imply and whether or not you want to be identified by them, she said.

In her academic courses, Oboler starts out by making students question themselves as to how they identify ethnically. Oboler states that she is teaching not only Latinos in her classes because "these issues affect us all as citizens and residents of this country."

Due to these labels and what they imply, Oboler has come across many students, not only of Latino descent, who are to a certain extent in denial of their cultural heritage. She encourages them to look into the history and literature of the formation of the United States.

Oboler said that "racial minorities have long had to deal with self denial," and the conflict between heritage versus politics perpetuates this. In this country, to be a Latino automatically becomes a political issue, she said. "Latinos must struggle to override one of the least recognized problems, that of invisibility, particularly in pedagogy."

By reconstructing historical events we can see that Latinos don't find themselves politically or historically represented. Although they may have been physically present, in a larger context their presence is not truly acknowledged, according to Oboler.

Time and time again attention is directed to this larger context; instead of looking at Latinos as Salvadorians, Cubans or Argentineans, we concentrate on "Hispanics" as an all-encompassing group, a label which negates our individuality, Oboler said.

Politics of banning smoking

Geri Sahn

She reached into her pocket and pulled out a cigarette. She was having trouble lighting it because it was windy outside.

"I just heard on the news that New York City is cracking down on the smoking laws. They want to try to ban it from a lot of places. They are also reviewing the smoking ban legislation again here in Amherst and Northampton. Some of the restaurants are not complying with the laws."

"Oh, great. Why don't they realize that banning smoking from the restaurants is just going to hurt the businesses. And how are they ever going to really push for these laws in New York. I can't believe they are even trying."

"Why don't the restaurants just comply, and save some lives from the second-hand smoke."

"That is why there is such a thing called smoking section. So those who don't smoke can have a choice not to be near those who do."

"Smoking sections are worthless. The smoke gets in the air, which in turn gets in everything else."

"That's why restaurants should invest in ventilation systems."

"Is it worth it to spend the money on the systems? They probably cost a lot."

"I think places could lose more money by turning smokers away and not getting their business."

"According to statistics today, there are more non-smokers then smokers, and the places will lose the business of those non-smokers."

"There should be designated places for smokers only then."

"That is a little ridiculous. It isn't fair that somebody's bad habit should cause others to suffer."

She pulled out another cigarette and lit it.

"It isn't fair for a person, who happens to have a bad habit, to suffer either."

"So what do you propose in order to solve the problems?"

"I propose, like I said before, to have places with signs that say there is smoking, so those who don't smoke can be forewarned. It's very simple."

"I think this argument is going in circles."

"Well, at the rate our government is going, soon smoking will be banned from everywhere, including outside."

"Is that so bad? Maybe they'll be adding a few years onto your life span."

"I hate when people say shit like that. It's my habit, and my body."

"You do realize, that cigarettes will some day be banned from this planet. The companies will be taken over and shut down."

"I will bet you thousands of dollars that will never happen. The government is already stepping over the boundaries by making banning laws. I understand that some places, like McDonald's, chose to have no smoking allowed. But there are some restaurants that want to have the choice, and because of laws, can't. That, to me, is illegal. It's taking away freedoms."

"Now we are getting into an entire other topic — governmental regulations..."

"The government has no right to tell me, or any other smoker, where to smoke and if I can or can't smoke. Again, it's my body, my money. And think of all of the jobs that would be lost if they did close down the tobacco companies! That brings in a whole other issue."

She lit another cigarette.

"I think the government is trying to save lives. The man who used to pose for some of the Marlboro advertisements is now speaking out against cigarette smoking saying that the tobacco industry lies to its customers claiming that smoking is harmless. He has throat cancer now. Interesting, huh?"

"Again, it's my body. My throat."

"Fine. But when it comes to smoking in closed areas, be sure to think of those who don't have the dirty habit and don't want to be imposed upon by it."

Victims of a so called peace treaty

David Bloch

Once again, the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) demonstrated its incompetence in leading Palestinian people toward peace, or more exactly, its non-intention of respecting the White House signing (Israeli-PLO agreement), signed in September 1993. Yesterday, innocent people were once more the target of Palestinian "action toward Peace."

Palestinian suicide attackers killed seven Israelis and wounded at least 45 more in two car bombings Sunday in the Gaza Strip. The first attack, in which seven soldiers including two servicewomen were killed and more than 30 other people wounded, was aimed at a bus near Kfar Darom, a settlement about 10 miles south-west of Gaza City.

The second blast hit an Israeli convoy about six miles away from the first attack, on the road to the settlement of Netzarim, and caused several casualties. Knowing Palestinian tactics, the second attack was not only perpetrated to cause more casualties, but to slow down and make more difficult the access for rescue of both attacks wounded victims.

Three Americans were among those wounded in the first attack. Alisa M. Flatow, of West Orange, N.J., a junior at Brandeis University in Massachusetts, and her roommate in Jerusalem, Chavi Levine of Englewood, N.J., were travelling in Israel and were among those wounded. Alisa later died at the hospital, following her injuries.

Yesterday's terrorist attack was identical to the bombing in a cafe, situated in a very busy area near Natanya (central Israel) on February 3, 1995. The bomb blew up inside the cafe, killing 21 and wounding 30, most of them for life. The victims were all innocent Israeli soldiers, aged 18 to 22 years old, returning home on Friday for Shabbat. They never had the chance to return home to their family.

These barbarious acts are perpetrated more and more often, inside as well as outside the State of Israel, to weaken the Peace treaty. The only action taken by Yasser Arafat, the PLO chairman, is to "express his condolences to the families and to urge [Prime Minister Rabin] to do more to stop violence," such declaration being "forced" by Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

Well ... something doesn't sound quite right there. How could it be possible to trust and give more freedom to someone who abuses their rights? These abuses are not only being made in complete ignorance of the peace treaty, but also by absolutely doing nothing to cease violence by its own groups.

In another statement to reporters, Arafat denounced the attackers (PLO, Hamas and himself...), calling them "enemies of peace." On the top of that, the honorable Nobel Peace Prize winner called for "jihad on Jerusalem" and at the first place, never had denounced terrorism in public. These statements, including many others are not to make things better in the region.

Once again, nearly two years after the so-called "Peace treaty," the PLO doesn't seem to be demonstrating enthusiasm toward peace. Although the violence makes life difficult, the Israeli people still believe in a real peace for the future, but for how long? Do the Palestinians want a real peace or do they just want to take over Israel?

With the elections in Israel approaching, a different approach may come in the form of a new Prime Minister, Benjamin Netanyahu.

Chalk washes away with rain

To the editor:

As a member of the Alliance for Economic Justice, I would like to respond to the Alex Kasendorf, "Protester's actions disgust student" in the March 31 edition. The AEJ, a welfare-rights group who participated in the rally against the Contract on America, uses the slogan "You're Next" as a major tool in our campaign.

As Mr. Kasendorf points out that he understands what the slogan refers to, I won't explain it; but, if he feels that chalk, that washes off with the rain, is a more serious infringement on the rights of a citizen, than taking food from the mouths of children (as this is what the Contract will do), then I think he needs to examine his priorities!

The comments of the protester were certainly off-base, easily misconstrued, and foolish; but, I believe what the man was pointing out was that the fact that this country has the greatest gap between the haves and have-nots, and that the Contract is intended to widen this gap; he indeed had best not turn his back. The Contract asks for more and more jails for good reason, and it isn't for chalk writers. Get your priorities straight, Mr. Kasendorf.

Haigis Hoopla overshadows tourney

To the editor:

It's not fair every single semester the "World Cup" Intramurals has to compete with Haigis Hoopla basketball, which attracts hundreds for three days only.

It is played on the same weekend as the World Cup tournament. Total amount of people watching the game is only 20.

Well, I would like one of the tournaments to change their date next time. My team is the defending champions and we are going for two in a row. It's okay that we don't have any publicity or support from a nationally ranked basketball team. We love to play the game even if it is empty.

You'd be surprised by how many goals the teams will score in 40 minutes of game. I hope that at least one person will come down April 22 and 23 to watch the soccer teams play. The real World Cup attracts billions of fans around the whole world.

Incidentally, I saw Briana Scurry (Former UMass goalie and the National goalkeeper for the United States) in the Nike commercial. Good luck in Sweden in the Women's World Cup in June '95. The United States are the defending champions by the way.

Article "reeks of political bias"

To the editor:

As I read the article – "Demonstration on the Common defends Palestinian rights" (Collegian, 4/10/95), I could not help but think this article should have been reserved for the editorial page rather than appear as from page news.

It was ironic, moreover, that the editors chose to present this article under the guise of a "news analysis" since it reeked of a political bias, and did not provide any new insight into the Palestinian–Israeli peace process obstacles.

It was unclear if the author of the article, Syed Mohammed Ali Raza, was reporting his coverage of the demonstration or presenting his own political beliefs. For instance, does Raza believe Rabin and Peres are trying "to pacify the world opinion while maintaining Israeli domination" or is this statement attributable to the leaflet passed out at the demonstration. Whatever the case may be, I myself feel confident that Rabin cares far less about pacifying world opinion than about pacifying the suicidal Muslim extremists that killed at least six Israelis this past weekend in a murderous bus bombing.

Soldiers wish for pen pals

To the editor:

Hello! My name is Rob Durling. I am a soldier in the U.S. Army serving with 82nd Airborne Division out of North Carolina. On Jan. 10 we began a six-month mission in the Sinai Peninsula.

We are part of the Multinational Force and Observers. Our job is to make sure that the conditions of the Egyptian– Israeli peace accord are being met.

I am a team leader for a group of soldiers that man the gate for security on our main camp. It is currently a very lonely and remote patrol station. Even though our living conditions are not so bad, and our mission is relatively "danger free," life here can be dull and monotonous.

Morale drops so much due to the fact that we get so little information about life back home. What we need is a boost, and we believe we found a way to do it, with your help of course.

If you could find time, please drop us a line out here in the Egyptian desert. Soldiers love to get mail, and I honestly believe your efforts would raise spirits here.

Each man in my team selected his own university to write, mostly near the area where they live back in the states.

Jazz article not correct

To the editor:

The article in the April 4 Arts and Living section of the Collegian reviewing the recent Rodney Kendrik Sextet (quartet) performance was yet another example of Collegian misinformation. As an audience member and jazz aficionado, I too was concerned about the apparent lack of two musicians. My concern led me to query as to the whereabouts of the two musicians. I was given a straight– forward, reportable answer, not from the director of the program, not from the musicians or technicians or the organizers, but from the usher. I was told after asking one person the whereabouts of the others. The disparaging response I received was that they were lost. The article stated that "for some unexplained reason" they were absent.

Slashing onwards through the article I came upon another gem of misinformation, the sentence ends "Kendrik's keyboard and Robinson's tenor." Robinson's tenor? No — look again, listen again — that would be an alto saxophone. John Coltrane glorified the tenor to many a youngster, but alto saxes are more frequent than expected.

Last, but certainly not least, the term "recklessness" when applied to Thelonious Monk is simply inappropriate. I have never met a "reckless" musician whether "controlled" or not. "Unique" or "impassioned" are far more pleasing words.

Putting aside my negative commentary I was chagrined to see a follow-up article to the show. I was simply disappointed that it was intending to follow up, but somewhat flopped down, it must have been "humbly dissed" if that's possible.

Soap opera views are paternalistic

To the editor:

The April 5 article "Int'l speaker teaches with soap operas" about population control was among the more paternalistic we have seen. "When reasoning and logic no longer work, one man teaches through soap operas ..."

The "reasoning and logic" that doesn't work is a bourgeois reasoning that says that there are too many people on the planet and that some of them need to be eliminated. Instead of proposing to eliminate these people (already sterilization of Third Worldwomen is at 20 percent) as Ryerson does, why not eliminate the landlords?

Or kick out the World Bank, IMF and the multinational companies? Ryerson won't mention these things because as far as the bourgeoisie is concerned, the only thing on the table is the number of Third World people allowed to remain.

This is where his company, Population Communication International factors in. They produce soap opera style radio and TV programs to encourage the use of population control technologies. In the Third World, the masses resist imperialist (with the collusion of their comprador governments) population control.

There are many forms of coercion used to entice Third World women. Some women are paid to be sterilized. Ryerson works in the cultural sphere to ease the transformation of population and its economic base more into line with imperialist interests.

Women throughout the world want greater access to a variety of contraceptive choices, but oppressed women need political power, resources, food, health care, shelter, sanitation and other necessities for survival.

Imposing population control on Third World women while not addressing these other shortages will only increase suffering.

Bands to battle for opening slot

By Matthew Justin Foerber
Collegian Staff

For most of the bands that play the UMass Spring Concert, the show is just one more stop on a national or international tour. For at least one band, however, it could be nothing less than the break of a lifetime.

Each year, the opening slot of the annual Spring Concert is given to a local UMass band. For these students, Spring Concert provides an opportunity to perform in front of an audience of thousands and gain a new degree of respect and recognition.

In order to determine who will receive the opening spot at this year's concert, University Productions and Concerts have collaborated with the UMass area governments to organize a Battle of the Bands to be held this Thursday night at the Student Union Ballroom. The winner of the event will get the Spring Concert opening spot.

Each residential area on campus has selected a representative band to send to the competition at the S.U.B.

The Central residential area has chosen Knuckle Sandwich to represent them in the competition. Over the past two years, Knuckle Sandwich has energized audiences throughout the Valley with their eclectic blend of rock/funk/ska/rap stylings. The band currently has a demo tape circulating entitled Vito Mack.

Representing Orchard Hill will be The Mitchells. Finalists in this year's prestigious WBRU/Providence Rock Hunt, The Mitchells describe their brand of edgy, alternative pop as "The Smiths–meets–The Pixies." The group has been a UMass favorite for quite some time and hopes to put a 7" single out in the fall.

The Southwest area will be sending the veteran "space–rock" outfit Architectural Metaphor. Since forming almost ten years ago, the band have brought their ambient, somewhat psychedelic sounds to audiences across the Northeast.

The non–traditional, four–piece outfit Sway will represent the Sylvan residential area. The band promises to deliver "a refreshing change from the "egular pop market" with their somber tunes.

Also, GFY will be representing the Northeast area.

The winner of the Battle of the Bands will be selected by a panel of judges consisting of a UPC staff member, a UPC general committee member, an area government member, a member of the SGA and an electoral vote from the audience members.

Anzaldua talks on race, gender

Award–winning poet, writer delivers speech based on book

By Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

GLORIA ANZALDUA
Bowker Auditorium
April 10

Award–winning poet and writer Gloria Anzaldua delivered a speech entitled "Envisioning a Future Without Fear" at Bowker Auditorium on Monday night during a lecture sponsored by the UMass Distinguished Visitors Program.

Anzaldua, a Chicana tejana lesbian feminist, spoke on many timely issues concerning race and gender. Her dual– themed lecture was based on her book, Borderlands/ La Froniera: The New Mestiza, which was published in 1987.

Anzaldua tactfully dealt with the issues of racism and sexism in the first half of her speech, explaining how she used the broad term "women of color" for women of ethnicities that had been marginalized.

Defining a race, however, is a complicated procedure. To elucidate her own ethnicity, Anzaldua uses the term "mestiza." Mestisaje is the term commonly used to describe a mixed Spanish and Native American heritage.

According to Anzaldua, she calls herself "mestiza" to incorporate not only her biological heritage, but her cultural heritage as well. Anzaldua uses the term "mestiza" personally to describe the Chicana, the Native American, the white and queer in her.

Anzaldua used her theory of "Nos/Ostras" when discussing problems of the separation between races. The writer hopes that her work can bridge the gaps or "borderlands," between races, such as the mestizas and EuroAmericans.

Suggestions were offered by Anzaldua on working towards building an alliance between races. Solutions for ending "the dual between the oppressor and the oppressed" involve more than simply communicating. Anzaldua's solution is something she calls "conocimiento." Conocimiento entails coming into each other's spaces with respect and understanding. It is only then that discussion will be successful.

Anzaldua's final advice, which rendered her a standing ovation, was to promote activism. She encouraged people to write and to speak out. As she quoted from her own Borderlands, "The possibilities are numerous once we decide to act and not react."

DirecTV discovers a nationwide appeal

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

EL SEGUNDO, Calif. — DirecTV had such heavenly visions when it launched its first satellite a little more than a year ago.

Thousands of petite dish receivers would quickly sprout on rooftops across America, capturing 150 television channels for subscribers paying a fair–sized monthly fee.

Pay heed, children: Corporate dreams do come true. DirecTV, which went into nationwide distribution at the tail end of 1994, is closing in this month on a half–million customers.

Compare that to the introduction of other new consumer electronics and it's easy to see why DirecTV executives are in orbit. Compact disc players racked up first-year sales of 35,000; VCRs debuted with the sale of 30,000 Sony Betamax units.

For now, RCA is the sole authorized manufacturer of the dish system. In less than two months, Sony will be selling its version. A total of five manufacturers will be marketing the receivers within 15 months, boosting their availability.

DirecTV's appeal includes a dish that at 18 inches and currently about $700 is smaller and cheaper than the traditional models; sound and picture approaching laser disc and CD quality and — in the bountiful American tradition — a menu of program choices bigger than most viewers' TV tummies.

Eddy Hartenstein, president of El Segundo-based DirecTV, calls its initial success "magic." Competitors, including the cable industry, have their own pet name for the system: Deathstar.

Hartenstein credits Canada with originating the colorful moniker. Although DirecTV's two satellites — with a third to be launched this summer — could reach many Canadian homes, the TV industry there is fighting to bar the service.

A look at the impact on U.S. cable systems explains why, at least in part. Fear of cross-border cultural trespass is another reason.

According to a DirecTV survey of its customers, half live in cable-available areas. Of those, two-thirds were cable subscribers when they purchased satellite service through DirecTV or programming partner United States Satellite Broadcasting.

Black Arts Expo proves entertaining, provocative

Herman Hampton's Jazz Trio treated Sunday's audience to the classic sounds of the legendary John Coltrane.

Several aspects of the artwork of the Black community were given their due exposure on Sunday evening in an elegant affair at the Malcolm X Center.

Under the guidance of Senior Rachael Roberts, the event entitled "The Black Art Expo" came to life, offering the University of Massachusetts community the opportunity to take in some of their faculty members' and fellow students' creative visions.

Roberts, a sculpture major, coordinated the program, in addition to serving as its hostess.

Following a buffet dinner which was charmingly accented by Herman Hampton's Jazz Trio, Roberts introduced the first of three artists who would present a slide show exhibiting their work, Afro-American Studies Professor Dorrance Hill.

Three canvases, three visions

A sculptor whose materials range from 55-gallon drums to soapstone, Hill shared with the audience his battle with dyslexia in high school, his re-entry into the collegiate world at the age of 39, and the sources of his varied inspirations.

"When that force hits you, you have to do something," Hill said.

Perhaps most impressive of all the pieces (some of which were displayed alongside those of his fellow artists) was the plaster mural which served as Hill's master thesis. Standing 18 feet tall and measuring 40 feet across, the work entitled "Creation" was a spectacular biblically-inspired vision that daringly featured woman as the first human.

First-year graduate student Nnamudi Mokwunye followed Hill, telling of his geographical journey from Nigeria to the United States, and his artistic journey from comic book artist to painter.

Having finished at Dartmouth College (where his paintings have been commissioned by trustees) in 1992 with a pre- med degree, Mokwunye said he had already become disillusioned with his doctoral pursuits and found a desperate need to explore the human spirit through art.

"Have you ever had to use the restroom or something?" Mokwunye joked about his love for the canvas. "I had no choice. I had to do it."

Mokwunye explained that he will often do a limited series of works whose themes shift with the differing and difficult questions of universal existence.

"'Who am I' is perhaps one of the most dangerous questions you can ask yourself," Mokwunye, whose pieces will exhibited at the Admissions Center in April and May, said.

The final slide show belonged to Roberts herself, whose delicately gesticular sculpture focuses primarily on human and animal subjects.

Roberts' detailed piece, "Butterfly," proved to be one of her most challenging, as she said that she repainted the insect "hundreds of times" to achieve what she considered to be the ideal effect.

In one of the evening's most affecting moments, Roberts surprised her mentor Hill by following the close of her show with an award presentation to the professor of 15 years.

"He's outta sight," Roberts said. "He inspired me to be where I am right now."

Poets and fashion

Continuing the mood of intellectual stimulation were a trio of juniors, whose socially relevant poetry electrified the audience.

Patrick Belizaire offered views of American society through the eyes of a Haitian immigrant, particularly one who became inured to and accepting of African-American anger. Josephus Housey explored the angst of both a college freshman and an AIDS victim in two touching works. I Serene Oasis used her two works to provide blunt, yet remarkably insightful commentary on negative types within the Black community.

Closing out the program was a fashion show featuring clothing designed exclusively by junior Shamele Straughter.

Straughter's creations were diverse in composition, ranging from striking earth-tone dresses to playful military jumpsuits.

The expo's master visionary, Roberts, that she hopes that the event will grow in the years to come.

"It shows that the Black community can appreciate what we can share with each other," Roberts said.

NAH professor looks for stolen tool

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

Although this Sunday evening may have been one he would like to remember, Professor Dorrance Hill might prefer to forget an unfortunate recent incident.

An anvil, which had resided in the New Africa House basement workshop since the inception of the Afro-American Studies Department in 1969, was missing when Hill returned from spring break.

The piece is described as being 12 inches long, six inches high, and has a chrome-like appearance.

Hill said there is no evidence to suggest who may have taken the tool, which had first been used by classes taught by Hill's predecessor, Ray Miles.

"There's somebody in here almost all the time," Hill said. "Everybody used [the anvil]."

However, despite the fact that Hill conducts art classes, the piece may not be easy to replace, as the Afro-Am Department finances both Hill and fellow art teacher Femi Richards, not the Fine Arts Center.

Even though a $45 lab fee is charged of each of his 45 students, Hill's program still requires additional funds from the department pool to finance such basic materials as shears, pliers and plaster.

Thus, a new anvil, which Hill estimates will cost anywhere from $150 to $200, is not a feasible option for quite a long while.

Hill also said that the stolen anvil was made of a higher quality metal than most composites of recent times, meaning that purchasing another tool of its caliber would exceed the already daunting figure.

"We just don't have the money to replace [the anvil]," Hill said. "That's the thing that's so upsetting."

Another obstacle in replacing the anvil is that the University will not buy used equipment, such that if a suitably aged anvil were to be discovered, Hill would have to pay for it with his own funds or receive a donation independent of the University.

The only other course of action may be to raise lab fees, which Hill said he is reluctant to do, citing the high fees charged by many arts courses.

According to Hill, students have had to resort to using a cut-off portion of an I-beam and various other metal blocks as substitutes for the missing piece.

Despite his frustration, Hill has decided to adopt a no-questions-asked policy for any anonymous individual who wishes to return the valued anvil.

"Sometimes we all do things that we're sorry for doing," Hill said. "But just bring it back."

Paying respects to a fallen student

We, as the Black UMass community — graduates, faculty, undergraduates, and administrators — are writing to the editor to collectively voice our pain, frustration and sorrow over the loss of someone who touched many of our lives, James Humphrey, Jr.

We were extremely disappointed, yet not surprised, with the impersonal nature and lack of empathy conveyed through the Collegian's article, "James Humphrey, Jr., 26," dated March 26, 1995. We found it a cold article that created the illusion that James Humphrey was a man without loved ones or friends. That his death was incidental, a mere fact to be reported, nothing more, nothing less. His existence inconsequential, his life without meaning or impact on those who knew him.

So, we are writing today, to retort to this image, and to pay tribute to a person who we considered a friend, whose death we consider a tragedy and regard as a great loss to all who knew and loved him.

James was a kind, energetic, fun-loving man who always had a kind word to share. He was the type of person that after you had spoken to him, you left his presence with a smile on your face. James will be remembered as a genuinely nice guy who never said or did a detrimental thing to harm anyone.

He will be greatly missed within the community as he was very active as a volunteer for the Office of Minority Graduate Student Recruitment, and as a tutor for both the Minority Engineering Program (MEP) and the Collegiate Committee for the Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEBMS).

As a student, James was very ambitious. While pursuing his M.S. in Mechanical Engineering, he found time to take classes in Spanish, Portuguese, and Industrial Engineering.

He was also very committed to cultural diversity. He respected the inherent differences of our colorful community and welcomed all cultural interactions as an opportunity for a learning experience. If you wanted information on an upcoming cultural event, where it was located, which cultural club was sponsoring the event, which PVTA bus to take to get there, James Humphrey was your man.

Although we offer this typology of James, it only touches the surface of his character; yet, it does not characterize his identity. So, who was James Humphrey really? What was his identity? These are the questions we are forced to ask ourselves as we mourn the loss of our friend.

The answers are unclear.

However, it is apparent that our depiction is incomplete for the person we have described had no problems or concerns. We have described a person whose life revolved around the simple pleasures of cultural and academic events. It is at this point, as we search for answers, that we realize that our surprise of his personal struggles and subsequent death are closely related to some serious deficiencies within our community.

We have failed as a community at large for allowing an environment that does not foster open communication to persist. As Blacks, our individual responsibility to one another is an implicit commitment, based upon our common heritage, which many of us have allowed to become eclipsed by our day-to-day rigors.

We allowed James' smiling face to validate our unsubstantiated assumption that all was fine. We deeply regret this apathy and stand accountable for our transgression. If there is anything to be gained from this tragedy, it is the fact that we must unite and take steps that will diminish the possibilities that someone in a position similar to James could go unnoticed.

The feelings and emotions we have are intangible and difficult to articulate in words, but we hope our profile of James and our expression of what he meant to us indicates what a significant loss we have suffered.

Although James is no longer with us physically, he will live on in our minds, through our individual memories, and in our hearts through our love.

Jimmy Smith is a UMass student.

A special poem dedicated to the life of James Humphrey, Jr.

Listen to things
More often than beings,
Hear the voice of fire,
Hear the voice of water.
Listen in the wind;
To the sighs of the bush
This is the ancestors breathing.
Those who are dead are not ever gone

Those who are dead are never gone;
They are in the darkness that grows lighter
And in the darkness that grows darker.
They are in the trembling of the trees,
In the groaning of the woods,
In the water that runs,
In the water that sleeps.

higher but I like it."

Since Mejia's arrival, the team has much improved and her influence on the young squad has been remarkable.

"Catalina's maturity and consistency have been a great addition to this team," assistant coach Dan Rosenberg said. "Growing up on clay has given her great consistency, she gets the ball over the net beautifully."

The No. 5 and 6 voids were filled by freshmen Amy Sidran and Shari Rosenthal respectively. The two each won their matches with a pair of 6-0, 6-0 shellackings. Coach Judy Dixon was very impressed with their results and did not expect a pair of shut-outs.

"I don't ever expect anyone to win 6-0, 6-0, because that's such a hard thing to do," Dixon said. "That's like pitching a shut-out in baseball, it shows great mental fortitude."

The team has a few days off now before entering their season finale this weekend in the Atlantic-10 tournament.

Goaltender Steve Geisler has played all but one minute of the Wildcats' games so far this season, compiling a lofty 12.53 goals against average.

The Wildcats will attempt to bounce back against their New England rivals, but it won't be any easy assignment the No. 10 Minutemen.

Massachusetts leads the all-time series 31-13 and have won the last 10 games. In fact the last time UNH beat its Southern neighbors was in 1985, when former UMass coach Ted Garber was still at the helm at New Hampshire.

Murphy warns that despite UMass' obvious advantage on paper, he said that the team needs a total effort.

"We're a better team than New Hampshire, no question," Murphy said. "The thing is that we have yet to play 60 minutes of lacrosse."

LoPresti said that New Hampshire will be the unfortunate recipient of Massachusetts anger over the Duke game.

"We're pretty angry," the senior goalie said. "We're going to go out there and want to pounce on them."

Cannella says that regardless of UNH's previous performances this season, the rivalry makes the game a battle.

"UMass is a big one for them," Cannella said. "If they win this game, it makes their season, no matter what they do. It's a very emotional game for them and I know they'll be up for it."

Game notes: Mike Valente needs four assists to move past Fred Menna (78 assists) into seventh place on the UMass career assist list. Jim McAleavey (171) is the current all- time leader.

Robic named full–time assistant coach

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

John Robic was elevated to full time assistant coach yesterday, filling a vacancy created when former associate coach Bill Bayno was named the head coach at the University of Nevada at Las Vegas on March 30. Robic was a restricted earnings coach.

Massachusetts head coach John Calipari praised Robic when he announced the promotion.

"John has always worked hard, and I've always believed in rewarding hard work," said Calipari, who also commented on the loss of Bayno. "It's always tough when you lose a member of the family, but Billy has an unbelievable opportunity at UNLV, and this is unbelievable opportunity for John. I'm excited for him and his family, and I know he'll do a great job."

Robic has served as the restricted earnings coach since 1988, where his duties have included scouting and coordination of video.

Robic, a graduate of Denison University in Ohio, will now play a major role in recruiting for UMass. The former Division III All-American was excited at the chance to move up.

"I hoped this opportunity would come and I'm grateful for the opportunity to get this position at UMass," Robic said.

"I wish Billy the best of luck at UNLV. Billy did a great job here and I've got some big shoes to fill. My No. 1 priority now will be recruiting and I hope I can do as good a job as Billy did."

Robic's promotion leaves an opening for a restricted earnings coach.

A source close to the team said former Minuteman forward Tony Barbee is a potential candidate to fill the vacancy.

"We pride ourselves on being sort of a blue collar team. We have a lot of heart, determination and pride, and I think I exemplify that," said Knight.

When the sun finally sets on his college career, what does Knight most want to be remembered as?

that drafted him has helped this headcase. (Whoa, did I say that? A headcase from the Pac–10? Never.)

Johnson (13.2 ppg, 8.2 apg) has returned from an unmemorable experience last season with the Golden State Warriors, and has provided the stability at the point guard position the Spurs have been longing for. I do not know why they ever let him go.

Del Negro (12.9 ppg) has emerged from mediocrity to find a outside shot, and he is just plain consistent in all areas, on both ends of the floor.

Do I hear "where's the proof" out there?

Well, here it is: Against the Lakers Sunday night, Elliott (18 pts, 6 reb), Robinson (26 pts, 18 reb) and Del Negro (22 pts, 7 reb) all were in double figures in their 101–87 blowout of this young talented squad. Johnson dealt out 15 assists in 44 minutes of playing time. Plus riding a fifteen game streak as of Monday, and that is my case, thank you very much.

• One of the major trades of the season, with Portland's two guard Clyde Drexler and Houston forward Otis Thorpe switching locales, has apparently pushed the team's fortunes in opposite directions.

Since Drexler's first game with the defending world champs (44–31 overall) on Feb. 16, the stats do not tell a story of major difference concerning his production. With Clyde's season stats, he has been averaging 22.2 ppg, 6.3 rpg and 4.7 apg in 69 games played. In his 28 games played with the Rockets, his scoring is not that different with 22.4 ppg. The man is good, flat out.

But the team has gone .500 (14–14) since the trade, because now the team does not have a legit inside presence besides Hakeem Olajuwon (please do not tell me know why they ever let him go.

Even the All World, ex–Phi Slama Jama center has been sick with anemia recently —and it looks bleak for the team to defend their title this year — especially if the burden is totally on the other ex–frat member (that is Drexler, for all you non– believers).

For Thorpe, the numbers also tell a tale of consistency. Season-wise, his stats run congruent with his in Portland (39–35 overall), with 13.3 ppg and 8.0 rpg not changing much with both clubs.

But the aspect that is most important with the ex-Providence College star is the intangibles he brings to the game. His presence in the locker room, and him being an all around class act, is something you can not judge by statistics.

Combined with the hot seasons by guard Rod Strickland and forward Cliff Robinson, and the emergence of former A–10 star Aaron McKie, the Trailblazers have a chance to be the Denver Nuggets of last year's playoffs.

Knight closing in on Massachusetts' HR record

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

The traditional weapons of a knight are a sword or a lance, but this Knight uses a baseball bat.

University of Massachusetts senior right fielder Bill Knight has been hitting homeruns since he was just a kid, but has made a name for himself doing it for the Minutemen.

"In Little League, I always used to be the one who hit a homerun or struck out," Knight said of his younger days. "As I've matured, I've made contact more. I always wanted to be known as a kid who can hit the ball, not just hit it far."

The right handed power hitter brought his act to Amherst four years ago, and he has been a star attraction ever since. Knight has cranked 30 career homeruns, six of them this year, putting him three shy of breaking the school record.

"I think my teammates want me to break the record more than I do," said Knight. "I try not to think about it, but it's always in the back of my head. Everybody knows it's in my capabilities, but the team goal is winning the A-10s and everything else is icing on the cake."

Knight's performance at the plate is one reason the Minutemen are standing tall this season with a 14-6 record (8-1 A-10), and riding a 10-game winning streak into today's conference doubleheader in Rhode Island against the University of Rhode Island Rams.

Knight led the Minutemen in long balls his freshman year with seven. He followed that up with 10 HRs as a sophomore and cranked another seven last year.

"I usually went in spurts at the beginning of a season, and then hit the ball well at the end," said Knight, a native of Holliston, Mass. "In my sophomore year, I hit two or three right at the beginning, and then had a cold spell. The last two weeks, I went on a hot streak."

Knight has started this season on a tear, blasting six homers already, including two games in which he went deep twice. "Coming out and hitting the ball well early is a good sign. I'm feeling very good, and have to keep up my consistency," Knight said. "[Massachusetts] Coach [Mike Stone] told me at the start of the season, 'You haven't scratched your ability. If you keep it up, you could be a powerhouse in this league.'"

Knight was originally brought to UMass as a catcher, but was moved to rightfield by Stone in order to get more playing time. Now, as one of the team's leaders, he sees this year's UMass club as one of the strongest he's played on.

"We have gotten clutch hitting and have a tough pitching staff. Confidence is a big part of it. One player gets a hit, and it's like a domino effect. Everyone says, 'Hey, this pitcher isn't so tough,'" Knight said. "You can look up and down our lineup and there isn't a weak spot. I have confidence in everyone. They can all rip the ball."

COLLEGIAN FILE

Bill Knight (10) will likely set the Massachusetts record for career homeruns, as he needs just three to break the record.

Knight knows a thing or two about ripping the ball himself. Besides the home run mark, he is also only 12 runs batted in away from becoming UMass' all-time leader in that category.

"I try to hit the ball hard, not far," said Knight. "If you hit it hard, something good will happen, even if it's just a line drive single. That is when the home runs come. When you try to hit it far, that's when you pop up and get into trouble."

Despite his success here at UMass, Knight still has trouble comparing himself to anyone on the major league level.

"It is amazing the way they can play day in and day out with such consistency. I've had weeks where I know nobody can stop me, but also others that were just the opposite," said Knight. "I really admire major leaguers for that, and I would hope to one day be able to grasp that concept of consistency."

Hard work is something Knight and his teammates are no strangers to. In fact, according to Knight, work is one of the main ingredients in the success of the

Softball splits two with rival UConn

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

Sam Cardenas extended her hitting streak to 18 games and Kelly Daut pitched her third shutout of the season as the University of Massachusetts softball team split a doubleheader with New England rival Connecticut yesterday afternoon in Storrs, CT.

The Minutewomen won the first game, 6-0, before losing the second, 3-0. UMass' record now stands at 20-12, 6-0 in the Atlantic 10 while UConn's record stands at 15-12, 10-1 in the Big East.

Cardenas went 1-4 with an RBI in the first game hitting a single in her first at-bat. Then in the second game she smacked a double in the seventh inning to continue her hitting streak. In seven innings pitched, Daut gave up only three hits while striking out five Huskie batters to improve her record to 13-5.

In the first game, freshman Tracey Osier led the way at the plate going 2-4 with two RBIs. The Minutewomen got their first run in the top of the second after Kim Gutridge (1-3, two runs scored) led off the inning with a double, advanced to third on a Michele Shaw sacrifice and then scored on an Osier single.

UMass got one more run each in the fifth and sixth innings before breaking out for three runs in the top of the seventh.

Chris Martens (2-4) started things off for the Minutewomen leading off with a single. Kelly Buckley got on base via an error and then Gutridge walked to load the bases for Shaw (1-1, two RBIs), who hit a sacrifice fly scoring Martens.

Heather Dorsey then walked to load the bases again. Following an Amy Powell line drive to second base that was caught for the second out of the inning, Osier came up with the bases still full and knocked in Buckley with a single.

Cardenas then came up, also with the bases loaded, and was hit by a pitch allowing Gutridge to score the Minutewomen's final run of the game.

Dani Ortega took the loss in the second game dropping her record to 7-7. In six innings pitched she gave up five hits, three runs (all earned), struck out three and walked three.

The Minutewomen could only muster three hits in the second tilt with Cardenas hitting the double to extend her hitting streak, and Gutridge and Osier each getting a single.

UMass returns to action on Friday when they will host a doubleheader against Rutgers, who is currently in second place in the A-10.

Spurs depth proves key, Blazers like '94 Nuggets

The final part of the regular season is here, and down the stretch they come. The big horses in the NBA are getting ready for the postseason "bonanza," and one of best in San Antonio center David Robinson has the Spurs at the top of the Western Conference. (Would he be Hoss or Adam?)

Jorma Kansanen on NBA Basketball

With a 56-18 overall record, and an outstanding 26-11 on the road, the "forever early playoff exit prone" Spurs have used a late season roll to jump the Sonics (53-21) and Suns (53-22) for the hallowed postseason home court advantage.

But it is not all in the form of the former Naval Academy standout (27.7 ppg, 10.8 rpg this season) that marks their success, but the players that surround him.

What has marked the early exits in past years for San Antonio was relying on the multi-talented Mr. Robinson too much. From trades to releasing, signing and drafting the wrong people, the total team chemistry created by upper management has been one of upheaval.

Even one of their best trades, in the form of former Detroit Piston and rebounding maniac Dennis Rodman (17.4 rpg), almost blew up in their face; especially with his holdout at the beginning of this season.

But even the immature angst of The Worm has abated, which is not helped by his recent shoulder setback, since he now realizes his team can accomplish something substantial this year. That figurative pill he has taken is the return of some key players to the Spurs, both on the court and on the bench.

Forward Sean Elliott, and guards Vinnie Del Negro and Avery "Little Joe" Johnson, have once again made the team a legit contender. With Elliott (18.3 ppg), the former Arizona star has finally gotten over the shock of his trade (for Rodman) two years ago, and has contributed both his inside and outside game to the cause. His short stay in Detroit was marred with injuries and illnesses, and the return to the team

Defense key to men's lax plan at UNH

By Matt Vautour

Following the heartbreaking 9-8 loss to Duke a week ago, the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team was silent on the sidelines. Despite an exciting game, that UMass almost pulled out, the Minutemen were dejected on the sideline.

"After that game was over, I've never seen a team so silent and so frustrated about what we could have done, and we didn't get there," said senior attackman Jeremy Murphy.

"We were fired up before the game, fired up all through it. We went through the mistakes that we made, but we did a lot of great things out there especially defensively."

It will be that same defense which Massachusetts (2-2) will look to as it tries to put that loss behind them. The Minutemen head to Durham, N.H. for a matchup with the New Hampshire.

The Minutemen will, however, be without starting goaltender Tom LoPresti (strained hamstring), who has an impressive .639 GAA in four games. He will be replaced by either John Kasselakis, who has given up one goal in two brief outings, or sophomore Kevin Ratkiewicz, who started against the Wildcats last year.

Coach Greg Cannella said that he would be comfortable starting either goaltender.

"We're confident in both Kasselakis and Ratkiewicz, so we'll see who warms up better [before the game] and make the decision then," Cannella said.

Regardless of the goaltender, the rest of the Minuteman defense plans to keep playing to the level it has been.

Senior defender Vinny Dello-Iacano said that the work ethic in practice carries over to the defense's play.

"We work hard in practice, and what we do in practice carries over to the game," he said, who also cited team chemistry as key. "We work together as a team and stay together."

Senior captain Jared Lanning pointed to the team's attitude as important to this unit's success.

"The attitude and the focus of everybody has been consistent," Lanning said. "This year has been a 100 percent turnaround and its shown in the way we play."

The Wildcats (3-5) enter the game trying to break out of a slump. New Hampshire jumped out to a 3-0 record in exciting fashion, as all three victories came by only one goal.

The honeymoon came to an end abruptly for the Wildcats, who were beaten handily at Hartford (11-6), and then shellacked 21-9 by Hofstra four days later.

The two games started a five game slide that was capped by a frustrating 10-9 setback at home against Michigan State.

Offensively Dave Hanchett is UNH's top finisher with 24 goals so far, but the offense really focuses around Mike McCulloch who has 16 goals to go along with 15 assists.

Women's tennis sweeps Rhode Island

By Mike Brown
Collegian Correspondent

Nothing could have been more perfect for the University of Massachusetts women's tennis team yesterday. The weather was perfect and so were the Minutewomen.

UMass completed a clean sweep over the University of Rhode Island as they pounded the Rams 7-0.

The afternoon started off with the doubles matches, which was set up differently than usual. They played a pro set, which it sets straight to eight. One point was awarded to the school that won two out of the three matches.

That was an easy task for the team as they won all three. The duo of team captain Lies Sitton and freshman Caroline Steele winning convincingly 8-1 in No. 1. The UMass No. 2 team of freshman Noelle Orsini and exchange student Catalina Mejia were flawless, posting an 8-0 shutout. Senior Mary Swarzis and freshman Shari Rosenthal rounded out the sweep of the doubles with a convincing 8-2 win at No. 3.

Off on the right foot, UMass entered singles competition with a 1-0 lead, and the punishment towards URI did not stop. Sitton, as always, represented the Minutewomen at No. 1 singles and defeated her opponent handily with a 6-1, 6-0 victory. Sitton was pleased with her work but was confident with the outcome all along.

"This was a different level," Sitton said. "I just needed to go out there and win decisively, there was no doubt that I was better."

UMass Freshman phenom Noelle Orsini continued her strong play with a 6-2, 6-2 win at No. 2. Orsini who had played well but dropped tough decisions to powerful No. 2 opponents in the past, was pleased with the result.

"It's good that I played a solid match before the A-10's," Orsini said. "Having a nice win under my belt gives me more confidence going in."

At No.3 for the squad was Sittons' doubles partner Steele, picking up right where she left off in handing her opponent a 6-0, 6-1 loss. Steele attributed her easy win to the fact that she was able to stay focused.

The No. 4 slot in the Minutewomen line-up was filled by the teams best baseliner. Mejia, accustomed to the clay courts of South America, appears to have adapted just fine to the hard courts as she blew out her challenger with a 6-0, 6-0 shut-out.

"Playing on hard courts is like a challenge for me," Mejia said. "I am doing my best, the level of play is much

Women's lax faces toughest opponent of year

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (2-4) will have its toughest test of the season today as they face Dartmouth University in Hanover, N.H. at 4 p.m. UMass has had some success as of late, winning two of their last three games.

Today's game at Chase Field will be against the No. 3 nationally-ranked team in the country, and who also has recently beat the defending national champion Princeton squad, 10-9.

The up and down goal scoring by the Minutewomen this season was snapped last Sunday, as they soundly defeated St. Joseph's, 19-6.

Powered by nine different scorers, the output of freshmen attackers Jen Bowen (5 goals, 1 assist) and Joanna Dignazio (3 goals) helped lead the team to the win. Last season's second leading scorer for UMass, sophomore attacker Stephanie Walsh, has continued her scoring pace with 12 goals, while Dignazio is right behind with 10.

The defense has been there, as freshman goalie Kate Brew and the Ridley High connection of sophomore defenders Michelle Warrigton, Erica Bryan and Kristen Hocker have not let more than ten goals per game in their last three contests.

They will need that kind of defense as All-American Lauren Holloran leads the Big Green in scoring this season with 21 goals and 7 assists.

As of last weekend, the senior attacker is on the verge of cracking the 200 point barrier (198 points, on 161 goals and 37 assists).

The offense has been potent, as they have outscored their opponents by a margin of 60-49. Goalie Kirsten Prettyman has been solid in her six starts with a .608 save percentage.

Their 5-1 record is only marred by the loss against No. 8 nationally-ranked Penn State last Sunday at State College, Pa., 9-7. The win over Princeton on April 1 almost flew back in the faces of Dartmouth, as their opening 9-1 lead was cut down to the final score of 10-9.

Statehouse fumbles; education to benefit from $35M surprise

By Robert W. Troff
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — The House kicked off its budget debate Wednesday with news of a happy mistake — a House Ways and Means Committee accounting error was discovered, and an extra $35 million was found.

House members quickly voted to spend the $35 million windfall on education, including $26 million for cities and towns. The move means communities can spend other local aid dollars — which had been earmarked for education — on other expenses.

Ways and Means Chairman Thomas Finneran, D-Boston, warned that amendments to increase the proposed budget's $16.8 billion bottom line immediately should be shot down.

"We're standing buck naked, and there's nothing left," he said.

Monday's budget debate centered on whether cities and towns would be required to spend a large chunk of their local aid money on education.

Finneran said discovery of an error he committed in another part of the budget — he accidentally listed twice an account aimed at enforcing welfare child support collections — provided the $35 million surprise.

"It allows us to free up the lottery money" for education, he said.

The Massachusetts Teachers Association, though, said the House still wasn't living up to the funding commitment it made in the 1993 education reform law.

The union — described by Finneran as "selfish pigs" earlier this week — said that since the House proposal makes no allowances for inflation, education funding is still running short.

In fiscal 1996, $49.3 million was supposed to be added for inflation, MTA spokesman Steve Wollmer said. Even with the $26 million in "found money," he said, the House was $23.3 million short.

"They have gutted the foundation budget," Wollmer said, adding that lawmakers were putting the state in jeopardy of having to return to court over the way it pays for education.

On Monday, members agreed to a change in the complex education funding formula that would provide an additional $17 million for affluent communities that were receiving minimal aid but dealing with swelling rolls.

In other action:

• Attempts to push back the opening of charter schools, designed by teachers, parents and educators, from this fall were defeated.

• A moratorium on granting agent applications for the fast-paced Lottery game keno, which has raised concerns among many local officials, was approved.

Students get glimpse of off-campus living at fair

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Students got a jump start on their apartment shopping this week at the third annual Complex Housing Fair.

About 20 area realtors were on hand on the Campus Center Concourse Tuesday and Wednesday to answer questions from students weighing the options for fall housing off-campus.

Cost was the biggest concern, housing representatives said, but parking and pet policies were a close second.

The fair was sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center.

"It's been really helpful," said Jessica Sowa, a junior English and political science major currently living in the Sylvan Residential Area. "I found a really good place."

Most students were looking for a three- or four-bedroom apartment because of the lower cost per tenant.

"I realize there are only so many apartment complexes in Amherst, but I was expecting more," said Kelly McLellan, a junior sociology major living in Central Residential Area. "I've been in the dorms for two years. It's time for me to move off."

In addition to getting to know the area apartments, students are realizing that it can be pretty expensive to live in their own space, said Mike Parsons, manager of Mill Valley Estates.

"One of the first things we do is go over the person's budget, whether they have $200, $250 or $300 to spend on housing," Parsons said.

"You can't expect to live in your own room for $300 a month."

While some apartments, such as Sugarloaf and Mill Valley estates, offer high quality residences as their prime selling point, others market ideal location as their best asset.

"Location is a turnoff at some places," said Jerome Alexander, property manager for Brandywine apartments. Brandywine is located one mile from campus.

When students prepare to sign a lease, they should bring it to Legal Services or the Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center. Many students sign a lease without fully understanding it, said Joanne Levenson, director of the Resource Center.

The Housing Fair first took place in the Student Union Ballroom and has since moved to the Campus Center at the suggestion of UMass students, Levenson said.

The Off-Campus Housing Office is also encouraging students who plan to sublet their apartments this summer to visit the office in order to walk them through the legalities of the subletting process.

Asian–American issues tackled by professor

By Lisa Chiu
Collegian Correspondent

"We are in the midst of one of the most intense anti- immigrant sentiments that the U.S. has ever seen," said Peter Kiang Tuesday night to an audience of 75 to 80 students, most of whom were Asian and Asian–American.

Kiang is an assistant professor in the Graduate College of Education and American Studies at the University of Massachusetts at Boston.

Kiang began with the words of a Vietnamese student in the aftermath of severe racial tension at South Boston High School. The student voiced concern at the failure of the school administration to deal with all races — it mainly focused in terms of black and white.

"No one asked where the Asian voice was, where do we stand?" she said.

"Where do we stand" was also the reoccurring theme throughout the lecture. He talked of how schools do not address the concerns of the Asian students, saying that no such concerns exist. This stereotypical view is commonly held for Asian–Americans and a view that is immediately dispelled when one looks at reality, Kiang said.

Kiang cited several incidents of hate crimes against Asian–

U.S.–Israeli relations discussed at speech

The cutting off of United States aid to Israel and armed struggle by Palestinians are the two keys to a better future in the Middle East, Dr. Israel Shahak, noted Israeli chemist and political analyst, said in a talk at Thompson Hall this past Monday.

Shahak, Professor Emeritus at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, moved to Palestine with his mother in 1945 after two years in the Bergen–Belsen concentration camp. He spent 25 years as chair of the Israeli League for Human Rights and Civil Rights and has published extensively on the topics of Judaism, Jewish history and Israeli society.

Speaking on "The Impact of the Current Peace Process on Israeli Society," Shahak emphasized that American money underwrites fortifies the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"Stop giving Israel money," Shahak repeatedly said on the issue of what the United States could do to promote peace in the Middle East. "Of course I would like all the aid to stop, but even if 1 percent of the money were cut, this would mean a great deal to Israeli public opinion."

Shahak called on Americans to "fight for any reduction you can, no matter how small."

He said that from September 1982, "Israeli Jews have been almost unanimously certain that whatever we will do, America will continue to support us financially."

Shahak said that this was concluded after the September 1982 massacre of thousands of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps in then–Israeli occupied Beirut.

"The whole world, including a big part of the Israeli public, condemned Sabra and Shatilla, but the American Congress reacted by increasing the aid to Israel by $300 million," Shahak said. "This was taken as a final proof, and nothing has changed, that whatever Israel does, the financial aid from the United States is secure."

Shahak said that the present process is "not directed toward peace, but is designed to allow Israel to continue to control Palestinians more efficiently."

"By the time of the signature of the Oslo Agreement, 70 percent of the area of the West Bank and about 30 percent of the area of Gaza had been confiscated and belonged offi-

Vending vandalism a trend on campus

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts police department has been reporting an increase in vandalism on vending machines for the spring semester.

There have been 14 incidents of vandalism to vending machines since February of this year, according to police documents.

"In the spring, it always increases. All the vendors know that we are more vulnerable [at this time]," said Bernard "Bud" Wilkes, associate director of the Campus Center and manager of the University Vending Program.

"Trends also show that before holidays when students go away there is a small upswing."

According to the police, on March 17, the Friday before spring break, there were four reported incidents of vandalism.

Wilkes said the vending machines include those that dispense soda, snacks and clean laundry.

"I don't think [the vandalism] is any more than it has been in past years," Wilkes said.

Wilkes estimates the worth of the snack vending machines to be approximately $2,000.

According to the Criminal Laws of Massachusetts, the punishment for damage of more than $250 to personal property is imprisonment for up to 10 years, or a fine of $3,000 or three times the worth of the property, whichever is greater.

"The vendors will prosecute if we get somebody," Wilkes said. "Students don't understand that the revenues from the vending machines support the campus and a cultural enrichment fund ... it hurts everybody."

When it comes to the snack vending machines, Wilkes said the majority of the time, no food is actually taken, just the glass is broken.

Although the snack machines do seem to be more popular, the others get hit as well. Sometimes the vandal is going after the coin box, Wilkes said.

"Students here are ingenious, they come up with the darndest ways to get them to operate for free," Wilkes said. "But in the next year or two, we will go to a cash-less society so most machines operate on debit, very little coins ... a lot of schools have done that, it's the future."

Wilkes said he feels going to school is the time in a person's life that this sort of thing happens.

"This is part of being a young person," Wilkes said. "They don't understand what the consequences are — it hurts everybody."

According to Tom Robinson, vice chancellor for student affairs, every year he receives the money from the revenues of the vending machines. The revenues are then allocated to different agencies around campus, like the Fine Arts Center and the Dean of Students Office.

"There is also a significant amount of money that goes to the Cultural Enrichment Fund," Robinson said. "We have a committee that reviews proposals and make recommendations to me about which organization, activity or program should get it."

Several different organizations are recommended from the Student Affairs Cultural Enrichment Fund Committee, and Robinson said he allocates money to more than one organization.

"We have a lot of activities and programs that come from the money of the vending machines," Robinson said.

Americans — incidents at the college level at UMass–Amherst and the University of Connecticut, as well as in the nearby towns of Lowell, Boston and Fall River, with death as a result.

When asked why students don't report racial harassment incidents, the typical reply is that there is nothing that could be done. These are prime examples of disenfranchisement, Kiang said.

He spoke of the relationship between the United States and Asia throughout the twentieth century, a relationship that has always been defined by war, according to Kiang.

From the Spanish–American War through World War II, the cold war, the Korean War and the war with Vietnam, armed conflict has been the trademark of U.S.–Asian relations, Kiang said.

U.S. trade relations with Japan, which he calls "a Trade War" as opposed to actual diplomatic relations, are but one example of U.S.–Asian relations. Kiang cited one congressman who, when asked how to solve the trade deficit with Japan, said the solution would be to recharter the airplane that dropped atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

Kiang touched on aspects in Asian–American history from the Exclusion Laws, the forming of Asian communities and detainment at Angell Island, the liberalization of the Immigration Laws of 1965, and the resettlement policies concerning Southeast Asian refugees in the 1980s.

Kiang expounded on this last issue. The government's final decision was to place them in separate areas all across the country, the premise being that if they were separated, they would assimilate more easily.

After a few years, many moved to larger communities, building towns like Little Saigon and Lowell comprising of about 20,000 South East Asians, Kiang said.

Kiang closed with the reading of a short story written by Stephanie, a 7–year–old first grader from Boston.

"Once upon a time I was at recess. I was at the tire swings when a kid said 'you little Chinese stupid girls' to Elaine and me. Elaine didn't want to tell but I wanted to tell, so I told on him. And they said bring him over here, so I did. The kid had to stand on the wall. People that believe in your culture — I hope that won't happen to you — so listen up, believe in your culture, the end."

Do you think the University should be responsible for affordable childcare?

"What better place than the University to start with the kids? Not having childcare defeats the whole purpose of having people here. We need to give [graduate students] some place to put their kids and teach them something — get them used to being in an academic situation."
— DAVIS LAWRENCE, junior, economics, Brooklyn, N.Y.

"As a state school I think they should — It is directed more at the general public. The majority of the students that go here are a wide range of people, more likely to have older students and single parents. Being the second most expensive state school in the country, they should provide a simple service like that."
— JOHN LUNDIN, junior, engineering, Stockholm, Sweden

"Yes, if students want to go to school and have kids they can't afford to house, they should have the option to put their children in childcare and go to school. Maybe they could do it in a loan system, and pay back the school."
— MARCI MELZER, senior, history, Newtown, Conn.

"Yes, a university is supposed to be for everybody in the state. [Childcare] should be available so all students can go to school. It shouldn't be free, they should have to pay something for it. You can't make the other students responsible for their childcare."
— JESSICA DION, senior, mathematics, Holyoke

"No, because your kid is your own responsibility. I don't think it should be paid through the school. A lot of [students] have children, this would cost the school millions. There should definitely be other organizations and agencies that should help with childcare, because it is very important."
— PRITI PATEL, senior, psychology, Easthampton

"Yes, if they expect to give fair education to those people with a child then there is really nothing else they can do than offer childcare. Many people now are starting to realize you need an education, and for most people who already have a child it is kind of a bummer to deny them that."
— JEFF SMALL, sophomore, exercise science, Worthington

"Yes, it is another way to bring students to the University. A lot of men and women who have kids and need a degree want to come to a university that has childcare. If I had a kid and needed to get a degree and job to support my kid I'd want to go to a university that provides childcare so I could get that degree."

percent of West Bank land cannot be used by Palestinians," he said.

"Israel as a Jewish state is based on discrimination. This discrimination of land is a continuation of discrimination which occurs between Israeli citizens."

"In my opinion this discrimination is based on the secularization of the Jewish religion in its classical Talmudic form and applied to modern society," Shahak said.

"Labor promised the people that their way of controlling the Palestinians would be much more efficient and effectual than the Likud way of Shamir and Sharon," Shahak said. "This means controlling the Palestinians from the outside, controlling all the main roads and entrances into and out of population centers, but not keeping troops in towns."

Shahak said that the symbolic value of the West Bank for most Israelis in cultural terms is very great, that widespread knowledge of the Bible has created a "great attachment" to these occupied Palestinian towns such as Hebron and Nablus.

"The continuation of Israeli rule in the occupied territories is not in dispute [in Israel]," said Shahak. "Instead the dispute between Labor and Likud is between greater efficiency and building the national morale because of attachment to the past."

He ended his talk with an observation that he called "very realistic but also very shocking and very cruel." Shahak said that the only thing that would make Israelis change their attitude towards the Palestinians was a change in the power relationships.

"The reason why Israel made peace with Egypt and returned the Sinai to them was because we were defeated or half defeated by the new Egyptian army in 1973," he said.

"The Oslo process has not changed the factor of power, and therefore the great majority of Israelis remain committed to controlling the territories one way or another," he said.

Until the balance of power changes, Shahak said, "it is the fate of the Palestinians to be conquered."

"Ideology will change only under the impact of power, but not easily. While I am opposed to terror, I am in favor of Palestinians conducting armed struggle within rational and civilized means and that is the most efficient way in which they will win their statehood."

"The informed opinion in Israel both honors Hamas and hate it," Shahak said.

"They honor Hamas because of its undoubted honesty. Everyone knows that Hamas people will not steal any money entrusted to them and will spend it all on helping the people and on armed struggle, and certainly on helping the people."

SGA appoints new associate speaker

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association (SGA) underwent great changes in position last night due to the resignation of former speaker Mercedes Betanco last week.

Dave Garapollo, former chair of the senate's administrative affairs committee, was appointed associate speaker by new speaker Tom Darby.

According to Darby, the position of speaker will entail a great amount of work because many things in senate have not been running as smoothly as they should.

"I want to get SGA in the best shape possible before the new speaker and associate speaker come in," Darby said. "I want to make it a really clean and smooth transition."

The chair of the Ways and Means Committee, Ruth Malkin will also resign as of April 20.

According to Darby, Malkin was a valuable asset to the senate.

"In terms of Ruth, she did a great job and she will see the budget through," he said.

Malkin and her committee met for over 30 hours in the last two weeks, preparing the budget for presentation to the senate on May 3, she said.

The budget allots funds to various Registered Student Organizations on campus.

"We have been doing a lot of hard, grueling work and we are probably not the most popular people on campus right now," Malkin said.

Former Senator Larry Plano was elected to replace Garapollo as chair of administrative affairs.

The changes in senate are a step forward, according to Plano, who plans to work on filling vacancies in senate and proportioning the Greek seats of senate as percentage of the population.

"There are always a lot of vacancies and students who want to fill those vacancies, can't because they live in a building whose seat or seats are already filled," he said.

The senate discussed and debated a main motion to reform the way area government uses funding paid by students through and activities fee.

The motion was tabled for decision until next Wednesday's meeting, due to the fact that the motion was incorrectly written as "be it resolved," rather than "be it enacted."

If passed, the motion will divide the $6 fee in half. Three dollars will go to area government, and $3 will be put into a general pool, which is the present policy for the total $6.

"This will benefit smaller area governments in the long run," said Malkin.

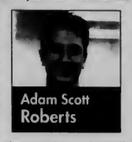
Caught in the crossfire of 'peace'



Adam Scott Roberts

Alisa Flatlow is dead because of the shameless terrorist actions made by the enemies of peace. The 20-year-old Brandeis University student on exchange in Israel was traveling to a beach-side resort during her Passover break when a terrorist bomb changed the course of her day and her life. Her life, dreams and innocence ended when she fell victim to the terrorist actions of the enemies of peace.

The bomb that ripped apart that bus sent a chilling reminder to the world that the peace process is constantly being hindered by random acts of terrorism. In this case it was a suicide bombing and not only did it injure 40 people but killed a few others, one of them an innocent young woman who was at the wrong place at the wrong time.

Alisa Flatlow represents the innocence of today's young adults. We are students and life is supposed to be care-free, where parties, going to movies and travelling are the things we like to do. We are not supposed to have any fears, for we have our whole lives ahead of us.

Alisa Flatlow will never get married, will never have children and grandchildren, and most of all she will never again be able to make a contribution to society. Lost is her innocence — a shameless and pointless death has ended any future for her. However, Alisa's family allowed that her organs be donated to people in Israel as her last contribution to the people of Israel and the land that she had come to love.

Ironically, the people sitting in the row behind her are still living and trying to pick up the pieces of their lives that will remain in a state of constant fear. It can happen anywhere, at anytime and without warning.

As I received a bulletin from a friend via the Internet I entered a state of shock as a high school acquaintance wrote about how sweet Alisa was when she knew her. The eldest of five children and from a family that lives in West Orange, N.J., she will never be a part of again.

Her home university remains shocked, and as flags are held at half-mast, the chilling reality that peace may come with a price. Alisa Flatlow's death makes everything hit home, and hit much harder than one can imagine.

Once again the world lays witness to the violence that has plagued Israel and the peace process. Alisa Flatlow is the name we all will discuss today. She is only the latest victim — for no one knows what tomorrow may bring. She most definitely won't be the last casualty — and that's an eerie and disturbing truth.

What has been widely reported is that she was a young woman, a 20-year-old. It should be discussed that the men and women who make up the Israeli army are around her age and are more aware of the realities of the society in which they live. The youth of today will be the leaders of tomorrow. Some of these very individuals will remember and recall what they saw with their very own eyes — a generation that is being rocked back and forth.

There have been many wars. There have been Scud attacks. And there have been random acts of violence that loom over Israel and those who come to study and travel there. Unfortunately, Alisa Flatlow will be remembered not for who she was — but she will be remembered as the first American student victim caught in the crossfire.

Tackling the idea of equality

Let's get something out in the open — men and women are just not equal.

Men and women have evolved to do different things — for centuries, men have been bringing home the bacon. This is a simple fact and there's no getting around that. Men are physically stronger. In most societies, men have gone into the woods, slaughtered the deer and wild boar, and come home to relax by the fire and drink ale.

At the same time, women have gone into the woods and gathered nuts and berries to go with the evening's dinner. By nature, men are hunters and women are gatherers. Women bear the children and men provide the necessities to help raise them. This is how it has been, and in reality, is how it will always be. The reason why this is true is because men and women have different niches in any human society. Whether men are out killing animals or pursuing careers, they are still bringing back to the home the necessities for a good family environment.

The home has been the woman's place for a long time, but it seems as if women nowadays would have the whole of human history changed in what is, from a historical standpoint, the blink of an eye. The fact of the matter is that a woman's place is in the home, as much as they might like to think that it isn't.

Evan Young

But this is not to say that women are any less important than men; it only means that women have a biologically different job than men do. Females are the only sex that can bear children. So, stemming from this obvious biological difference, it naturally follows that women should be the ones to stay home and care for the kids. But my one question: Why is this concept offensive now, in today's PC modern society? If I were to stand up in class one day and say "a woman's place is in the kitchen, barefoot and pregnant," it might be good for a chuckle, but it would probably piss many of my female classmates off.

Why? It shouldn't, because (except for the barefoot part) it's the truth. The home has been the woman's place for a long time, but it seems as if women nowadays would have the whole of human history changed in what is, from a historical standpoint, the blink of an eye. The fact of the matter is that a woman's place is in the home, as much as they might like to think that it isn't.

As an example, let us look back 1,000 years — If an Indian wife were to go to an Indian husband and say "Honey, I think it's my turn to go rustle up some buffalo flanks," the husband would probably laugh and say, "Yeah right, go make me a turkey pot pie." Women just weren't fit to do a man's job.

But times change, and the man's job has changed. Its gotten softer — no longer do we go out and hunt down our dinner, but we buy it at the store. Briefcases have replaced bows and arrows. The problem is that now all of us men are feeling trapped because of the lack of bloody red meat, and women are fit to do the so-called "man's job." But because of this, the way that both sexes look at their places in society has changed.

Women can go out and make careers for themselves, the way millions are doing today. And because of this, they are asking for almost immediate acceptance in the workplace. What do you women expect us to think? We've been the providers since the dawn of man — you can't expect us to just roll over and let you slaughter the venison on your own! It's not your place; it goes against generations upon generations of an ingrained, biologically induced male logic.

But it is a logic that's tried and true. Male and female roles have been basically well-defined for quite a long time until just recently. It shouldn't be a wonder why women are having a tougher time trying to land jobs in the workplace. In our society, men hold most of the power, and it is the "man's job" that women are trying to take.

So the real question is this: Even though women are now able to do the things men can do, should they be doing them? The PC answer is yes, but the true answer is no. If women want to try to go into the woods with us, then hey — that's fine with me, and probably most other men too. They should be paid as much and given an equal chance to come along. But don't expect men to be happy about it, and don't expect all men to think that they should be earning as much. Up until now, the woman's true role in society has been in the home.

If some women decide they want to pursue their own careers and forego their duties to the home, then there's nothing wrong with that — more power to them. But if they don't, then there's also nothing wrong with staying in the home. In many ways, it is a more respectable and difficult job to do, and it is one of the things that men will never be able to do.

Evan Young is a UMass student.

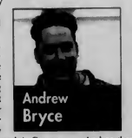
The cast of characters from home



Andrew Bryce

There I was, sitting in my house back at home, waiting for my friends to come by. I have to wait for them to come see me because I don't own a car. Instead, I have to rely on my good friends to cart me around. But it's all good though, they understand. They bust me up about it.

But they are always there if I do need them for a ride.

George comes by. His truck still running, the music blaring from the cab of his monster machine. George walks in the house without ringing the bell or knocking on the door. It doesn't matter if I'm walking around the family room buck naked (don't make that face), or if my mother and sister are funneling beers in the privacy of their own home (actually, they don't even know what funnels are, but I think the point is made). George doesn't think anything of walking into somebody's house without acceptance.

But it's all good though. My mother and sister expect George to barge in the house without ringing or knocking. But George is the only one who is allowed in that way.

Because that's George.

Eric comes by shortly after. Eric will have a pack of Camel lights in his pocket, and he'll finish one before he enters my house. Always calm, always cool, Eric is one of the more laid-back people I have met in my time. Eric is the type of kid who will do stupid things just to get a laugh. Because, generally, Eric is not funny like George is.

But that's Eric for you.

Mike comes by, blasting funky dance tunes. Mike lives a street away, but drives over each time. The king of silly faces and hilarious expressions, Mike stands but five feet off the ground, and weighs about a buck-o-five. Mike will come into my house, saying that the old person up the street "farts dust." Mike says this, and everyone busts out into laughter.

Because Mike can get away with saying that.

Lee stops on by in the red Mustang, complete with a license plate that says, "Love me, I'm Italian." His pants are pegged (rolling up the cuffs of your pants). Arguably the funniest kid I have ever met, Lee can get away with the annoying way he wears his pants.

That's Lee.

Hanzil is with Lee. First name Mike, but I call him by his last, Hanzil will come in reciting my phone number, full address, and the name of my neighbor's dog who has been dead for 10 years. Hanzil does this because he shows off his memory like he did the first time I met him, in a bar, after a few pitchers. Hanzil will act out Van Damme movies and talk about how he conquered a video game. And despite my hatred for video games, I accept it.

Because Hanzil likes video games.

And so there we are, all together in one place. Trying to talk over one another, telling stories of happenings from days or minutes before. Laughing and reminiscing about good times, past and present. Just hanging out — and having a blast.

I miss them when I'm at school.

Some of the friends I have met here at school, I love and will stay in touch with for a long time. But my friends at home are unique. I hear my friends here at school talking about how they stay in Amherst during the summer instead of going home. I can't imagine doing so, considering just how close I am with these guys.

In a perfect world, my friends could be here in Amherst with me. George could get a plumbing job on campus. Eric could continue to cut meat, maybe at Stop & Shop. Mike could get a job at WHMP as a disc jockey. Lee could transfer to the KMart in the Hampshire Mall, and Hanzil could assist George in his plumbing duties.

Each one of these guys mean a lot to me. I see them just four months out of the year, which is not enough.

Yet enough to realize how much I love to hang with 'em.

Notes from the Basement

Tracy Monahan

Well, it's that time of year again. The signs of spring are out. Pre-reg guides, final exam schedules, people lolling about the campus pond, frisbees.

Who cares if the campus is deteriorating and people are failing classes left and right — as long as the sun is shining.

******

Bring your stale bread down to the campus pond, all that duck play makes our fine feathered friends hungry. Several observers have noted that the ducks spend their entire day asleep by the pond. What's the deal with the lazy ducks?

******

And now a word from Notes correspondent and fellow graduating senior Michael McRae:

Instead of complaining about aspects of University life that are way out of our hands, it's about time someone takes a different angle. Since I'm all about angles, I'll summarize why I feel UMass ain't so bad.

Number one: the basketball program. As a child watching college hoops, I would have laughed if someone told me that UMass had a chance to knock off a powerhouse like, say, Holy Cross. These days Boston University gives the Cross fits, and UMass wins A-10 titles in their sleep. It's good.

Number two: the Sylvio O. Conte Polymer Research Center. I don't know what they do there, but it's big and it's good.

I hope I've convinced the many doubters that the UMass system does work and it works in the best interest of you, the student.

******

I don't get the chance to write on a regular basis (my conspiracy theory will be revealed in due time), therefore I feel it necessary to address an issue that affects each and every one of us several times each day.

The bathroom situation at this school is a very sticky subject (poor word choice) that most students choose to avoid. The sad reality is that ignoring the problem won't make it go away. If you have to go, well, you know the rest.

Just a few suggestions to help maximize the on-campus restroom experience:

• Avoid any rest area that caters to more than four participants at a time (for the guys, this does not include urinals). Any such place will work against you in a number of ways that are beyond the scope of this discussion.

• Along the lines of what was stated above, any bathroom located in or near an area of heavy traffic (i.e. Campus Center, SBA, etc.) will also produce an unenjoyable break in your day. Stick to the more isolated, less traveled routes of the outer parts of campus for a cleaner, more relaxing time.

• If you are in the vicinity, the head in the basement of Flint is second to none. I can't comment on the lady's room, but the design of the men's room makes you happy to be a part of nature.

******

T.M.: Before you go, Michael, a word about Hatch fries, if you will?

M.M.: Consistency is everything. Boycott Hatch fries.

******

Enjoy it while it lasts, it's coming to an end.

Letters to the Editor

Telefund workers care about UMass

To the editor:

This letter is in response to Carol Drzewianowski's opinions about the Telefund Program here at UMass. Did you know that the money raised by hardworking students at the Telefund office helps to keep your tuition down? The alumni, parent and friend donations also help to purchase library books and computers and help to provide scholarship aid for qualified students who can't afford UMass.

You are quite right in saying that many parents can't afford a $1,000 donation. But some can, and do. You never know unless you ask. So please, before you accuse Telefund employees of "being unfair" remember that those students and organizers at Telefund are working for you and your school. If you feel tuition is too high and think we could use more library books or more scholarship aid, remember — UMass Telefund is always hiring students who care about this University.

Dateline... Downtown Northampton

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

Although they are only separated by a handful of miles, on a Friday night, crossing over the bridge that divides Northampton and Hadley is like crossing over into a whole new world.

Last Friday night downtown Northampton was buzzing with activity. But unlike Amherst, its sister college town to the east which thrives on smoky bars and greasy pizza, Noho's atmosphere is one that revolves around diverse concerts, movies, browsing, shopping and most of all — late night cups of coffee.

In Bart's, which is located on Main Street in Northampton, the aroma of coffee floats strongly through the air as crowds of people wait patiently in line and chat quietly amongst themselves.

"When there's good weather we have people lined to the door," said Kevin Delano, a Bart's employee who is majoring in English at the University of Massachusetts. "We get all sorts of people, the students from Hampshire and Smith come in all the time."

And it is just this sort of laid-back, yet social, atmosphere that prevails in Northampton on this Friday night, with people lazily kicking back and enjoying a strong cup of coffee.

"In Amherst it's more drunk kids scoffing down pizza, here it's kids looking to talk after the movies and have some coffee and cake," Delano said.

Back on the street the brisk, but comfortable, night air is filled with the sounds of a 15-year-old street musician (who says he makes anywhere from $80 to $100 a night) playing a distinctly sad jazz number that kind of works as a soundtrack to the whole evening. All along the streets couples ranging from college students to senior citizens walk arm and arm, darting in and out of the numerous clothing, record and book shops that line the streets.

"We can stay open on Friday nights because there is a lot of people in Northampton walking around and looking at books," said Bruce MacMillan, owner of Broadside Bookshop in Northampton.

Throughout the Broadside, customers casually mill around, leafing through various books and magazines amid the relaxing silence that prevails.

"Northampton, for its size, has a lot more to do, compared to towns of comparable size. There are lots of movies, shops, theater and dance," MacMillan said. "That combined with the fact that Northampton is a lot safer."

These diverse factors surely account for the amount of people out and about on this particular Friday. Down on

Classic movies battle it out

This is clearly a remote control era in television — with so many new cable channels and so few quality programs to watch, it's become almost a necessity to have a clicker in hand to move one's search along.

This past Sunday, while flicking back and forth between NBC's 30th anniversary broadcast of The Sound of Music and ABC's epic annual The Ten Commandments, I was able to fully appreciate the crucial role that the remote plays in my life. Not until then did I realize how difficult it is watching two shows at once if you have to get up every five minutes to change the station. Needless to say, my viewing experience wasn't as fun as it could have been.

Tube Notes
By Tracy Gavel

Aside from this inconvenience, and what Moses might might call the ungodly number of commercials, there were some good moments to be had during this network battle between classic movies.

NBC wisely decided (after 16 years of frustrating audiences with hacked-up versions) to air a thankfully unedited version of Sound of Music that, despite its occasional silliness and some extraneous commentary from star Julie Andrews, was really quite entertaining.

Admittedly, Cecil B. DeMille's three-hour-plus biblical outing is the more dramatically satisfying of the two — particularly taking into account DeMille's great narration and the film's cavalcade of all-star villains, including Yul Brynner and the amusingly smarmy Edward G. Robinson. It always amazes me that no matter how many magic tricks Moses performs (including turning sticks into snakes, predicting devastating plagues and parting inconvenient bodies of water) almost every-

When you think about it, renting movies can turn out to be a spectator sport. Not that fisticuffs is a real possibility, but have you ever seen people race toward the new release rack with the determination of a Terminator, chanting "Timecop, must rent Timecop"? At Pleasant Street Video, Northampton, things are a bit different. Where else could you hear a dejected customer say "Damn, the new Bressan reissue is out."

For many people these days, regardless of movie taste, renting videotapes has become a staple activity of Friday night America, replacing a $20 trip to the theater for most or offering a dress-down, considerably less stressful alternative to the bar and club scene.

"It's less expensive generally," said, uh, Mr. Vdo (get it, Video), an employee at Pleasant Street Video. "Despite what statistics say, a lot of college kids aren't drinking. Besides, it's a nice social activity."

For area residents Sandra Payne and Matt Bousquet, the reasons for renting intersect at the point where their appreciation of films begin and their other

Dateline... Downtown Northampton

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

The sun has just about sunk below the horizon reflecting a red glow on the windows of downtown Amherst.

A bus pulls up to the stop at the Amherst Post Office and a group of people dressed in identical plaid and white caps jump off. Their voices fill the somewhat quiet air with laughter as bets are placed and bars are named — it's Friday night.

Around 8 p.m. Judy's has a line out the door with couples waiting for a table. Inside is the sound of clinking silverware, sighs of repletion and sudden bursts of laughter as waitresses run a hurried hand over sweat-beaded foreheads. Outside the groups of people passing by have grown larger.

Shouts of greeting, running feet and "Heyhow'sitgoing" can be heard over the brief blasts of music audible when the bouncer admits three more people into Time Out. Huddled together for warmth the line stretches down the sidewalk. Patrolling police cars cruise by. They are alert for the smallest sign of an uproar: a push, a shove — they know what to look for, it's a college town after all.

Jeff Milton, a sophomore photography major and his friend Jeffery Gomez, a sophomore pre-med major are standing near a phone outside Café DiCarlo.

"We usually go to a party. Anywhere there's a keg there's a party," said Milton. "There aren't any places to go and dance really ... except the Vertex and most people there are immature."

Both underage, the two point out that there isn't much to do on a Friday night in Amherst if you aren't of legal age.

"It's pretty nice here, quiet too," said Gomez shrugging. "Although, there are a lot of rules and restrictions. Amherst is basically a conservative town. Well, conservative and liberal with the students. It's a conflict of interest between students and people who live here."

The line into Delano's is relatively short. Inside people are cramped around the bar sometimes staring at a silent TV. The bartender goes by, orders are shouted, money is exchanged and another happy customer worms their way back to their table, triumphant. Walking by Time Out, two girls lean outside the door and signal to a group of guys. They smile. Pleasantries are exchanged, they are strangers but it doesn't matter, they take up the girls invitation and head inside for a drink.

At the Pub the scene is similar although the participants seem older and less frenzied. The real action doesn't start until 9 p.m. when appetizers go half price and the lines start forming out of nowhere.

Near CVS a group of people are laughing as only young people can and talking as they make their way past the throng of bar goers. Nickole Long is a junior psychology and environmental science major. She and her five friends chose to avoid the bar scene.

"We usually go to the Campus Crusade For Christ and then to a friend's house to watch a movie or sometimes go bowling," said Long.

Long chooses to avoid the bars because of the noise level and the drunk people. Like Long, a lot of other students choose not to drink on a Friday.

"The meetings are every Friday night and about 40-50 people attend. I think that the bar scene is annoying and I really don't want to hang out with a lot of drunk people."

Although some students try to avoid the bar scene by trying to do something different, often times they are thwarted by the PVTA. Such is the case of Muhammed Yousef, José Quijada and Javier Orvis. The three usually go to a bar or to a party, but this Friday they decided to catch a movie at the Hampshire Mall.

"This night has turned out to be awful," said Yousef, a senior biology and pre-med major. "The movie started at 7:30 p.m. and we couldn't catch a bus and got there at 8:30 p.m. and when we did get there it

Dateline... UMass

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

A lone wolf sits atop a hill, looking down upon the empty valley below, and feels the sudden need to pierce the silence with a mournful howl. This is the UMass campus on a Friday night, where the ducks in the pond are in greater numbers than the people walking about.

On this particular Friday night, despite there being various events happening at the Fine Arts Center and The Cage, the campus itself is desolate, the street lights shining for only a few students who are trekking across campus. The Campus Center and Student Union are equally barren with a few individuals studying and catching some z's on the couches. A few lonely souls use the ATM and employees of the ministore are trying to kill time.

"Friday's are very slow, it depends on the activities," said Vilmarie Sanchez, a senior HRTA major who works at the campus mini-store and attended the University back in 1987. "I remember when they used to do things all the time, The Hatch and the Bluewall would be open."

One might assume that these characteristics apply all over campus on Friday nights, that the dorms are empty and everyone is out at a ragin' kegger', but this is not the case. In fact, a good one-third of all dorm rooms were lit up on this Friday night, and music was emanating from many of the buildings as people called from the help phones to get their friends to sign them in.

In Southwest the lines to get signed in are immense, leaving the security receptionist swamped for large chunks of time — across campus it's a different story.

"In Northeast it's usually pretty quiet," said Jenn Scheck, a sophomore English major who works the security desk in Lewis Residential Hall. "Most of the residents go out so I'm not usually signing people in."

Scheck doesn't mind the slow pace however, as even Northeast can't escape the occasional intoxicated antics.

"People are usually a lot friendlier on Fridays," said Scheck, "probably because they're drinking. Guys who think they're suave because they've been drinking have tried to pick me up."

Across campus there is a dimension of sight and sound, known as the Southwest Zone. Like a post-apocalyptic city of concrete pillars and steaming underground vents, the buildings in Southwest glow with blue florescent lights and neon beer signs. Music that ranges in everything from gangsta rap to Kenny Loggins spouts from the open windows while groups of people scurry around spreading the word about parties at white, brown and red houses.

After a long night of partying at all the vari-

People and Pop Culture in the News

All those who bow down to the, uh, movie messiah known as Quentin Tarantino should be happy to hear the, uh, "auteur" is making his second appearance on television this season. Following his, uh, stellar performance on "All– American Girl," this time Tarantino is going behind the scenes. He's scheduled to direct the season-finale of everyone's favorite hospital drama, "ER." Can he direct something out of the realm of his distinctly tiny and insular creative universe? We'll see ...

Seasons change and so do haircolors — at least if you're Linda Evangelista. The brunette, gone red, gone platinum has decided to go brunette and bobbed. Not that it will affect her paycheck or anything but you can bet peroxide sales will be going down.

And speaking of a decrease in numbers, supermodels Cindy, Naomi, Kate and Claudia were nowhere to be seen during Fashion Week, the big swing dig in Manhattan where designers strut their stuff under closely guarded tents. Word has it they're tired of doing the runways (boo hoo) and want to do more ... like open another chain of restaurants or write bad romance novels — hey, they can afford it! Hint to USA Today: Christy Turlington wasn't seen on the runway this spring because she retired from it last year.

And to beat the subject to death — Sly Stallone is engaged (again) this time to model Angie Everhart. Glamour magazine loves her and now so does Sly. Everhart rapidly went from Oscar date to blushing bride, and Sly's mom says, "Her astrology chart is favorable, too." Bonus!

Sad but true. Rod Stewart will not be retiring from the business after his upcoming tour. Why should the 50-year– old rocker let the Rolling Stones have all the fun?

Nicolas Cage and Patricia Arquette are married. Surprise! Who even knew they were dating? Will it last? And seems that question can also apply to the new Debbie Allen and L.L. Cool J sitcom, "In The House" (not to be confused with "House of Buggin'") featuring the king of cool as a housekeeper with Allen as a single Mom. Remember when it was called "Who's The Boss?"

Just when you thought Richard Bey was pathetic, get ready for the "Jim J. and Tammy Faye Show" staring Tammy Faye Bakker Messner and Jim Jay Bullock. And here we thought he was trapped in "Hollywood Squares."

Chastity Bono, daughter of Cher and ex-Rep. Sonny Bono has come out of the closet and is wasting no time with the publicity. She will be in the gay bi–weekly The Advocate and has a one–line cameo on Bar Girls, a low– budget lesbian romantic flick.

Material has been compiled from various news and wire services by Tara MK Connelly.

Editors' Cuts

Album Guided by Voices

Although the lads in Dayton, Ohio's Guided By Voices have recently entered the musical spotlight thanks to the their alternative hit album Bee Thousand, the band has actually been kicking around for quite some time.

With more than five albums already released on Scat Records, GBV is finally getting the chance to show all the johnny–come–lately's that have jumped on their bandwagon just what the group was doing before all the hype.

With Box (yes, it is a box set), which was recently released on Scat (the band has since made the jump to Matador), GBV showcases that their ability to craft infectious tunes was not just a talent that simply magically appeared as of late.

Throughout Box the band proves that long before low–fi pop was the "in" thing they were doing it with a distinct style and grace all their own.

Book Delusions of Grandma

Carrie Fisher has made the transition from actress to writer relatively smoothly. From her ear muff braids in the Star Wars movies to the fast–talking friend in When Harry Met Sally, to having her first novel, Postcards from the Edge, made into a major motion picture, it seems the girl can do no wrong.

In Delusions of Grandma Fisher writes with a smart witty style that keeps readers longing for more. Delusions is about the life of Cora Sharpe, a Hollywood screenwriter. She is in control and knows where life is taking her. Fisher offsets this pillar of strength with Bud, a manic–depressive writing partner, and William, who has AIDS and ends his life. Cora breaks up with her boyfriend and then, as is she had nothing else to worry about, her grandmother shows up asking Cora to help kidnap her grandfather from his nursing home. What else can a poor girl do but agree? Fast–paced, interesting and well worth a read.

Compilation Spin Art

While names such as Small Factory, Suddenly, Tammy! and The Magnetic Fields become a bit more noteworthy (if you haven't heard them yet — you will) there was a time when they were just unknowns, looking to stake their claim.

Recently spinART Records, located in New York, reissued their landmark compilation One Last Kiss, which documents many of these bands in their early stages. The compilation had been out of print and hard to locate for some time, but thanks to the label's sudden ability to mass–circulate their releases, it is back in stores. Other bands included are Lilys, Velocity Girl and The Swirlies.

The label is planning on releasing two more similar compilations soon, entitled Lemon and Lime, which will hopefully give the lesser known bands featured the same boost that One Last Kiss gave its roster.

Agüeros to read poetry, fiction

Puerto Rican author a voice for those who have been silent

By Marni E. Helfner
Collegian Staff

Jack Agüeros is a writer of psalms and sonnets. But more often than not, people refer to him as a poet.

Reading at the University of Massachusetts Augusta Savage Gallery this evening, Agüeros will spin a delicate tale of the lives of the Puerto Rican and Latino communities in the United States. Author of Correspondence Between the Stonehaulers, a book of poetry; Dominoes, a collection of short stories; and a forthcoming book of poetry entitled Sonnets From the Puerto Rican, Agüeros is also known as a journalist and a museum director.

Correspondence and Sonnets both focus on Agüeros' famous sonnets and psalms about everyday life. "Sonnet Substantially Like The Words of Fulano Rodriguez One Position Ahead Of Me On The Unemployment Line" is about unemployment and the marginalization of people of color, and "Psalm For Distribution" is about the homeless and shoeless of New York. His work focuses on the tradition of the poet as a speaker for those who have been kept silent.

Agüeros is the former director of El Museo del Barrio, the only museum in the United States dedicated to recording the lives of Puerto Ricans. He has recently won the prestigious Fellowship in Fiction from the New York Foundation for the Arts.

Agüeros' articles have appeared in The Village Voice and Nuestro. He has also produced a half–hour training film for "Sesame Street" and a drama broadcast on NBC in New York entitled, "He Can't Even Read Spanish."

A favorite of UMass English professor Martin Espada, Agüeros' Correspondence Between The Stonehaulers is used in many classes.

"Jack Agüeros is a major writer in our community, which means that he should be read by everyone," Espada said.

Also appearing with Agüeros are three local poets, Angel Nieto, Felipe Pantoja and José Gaud.

Admission is free. A reception and booksigning will follow the readings. The Augusta Savage Gallery is located in the New Africa House in Central Residential Area. For more information, call the Gallery at 545–5177.

Area author practices diverse styles

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The writings of Northampton author Leslea Newman cannot be classified in one genre because they are diverse in both content and form. In 1995 alone, three of her books will be published.

In March, Too Far Away To Touch, a children's book about a little girl's relationship with an uncle who has AIDS, was released. A Loving Testimony: Remembering Loved Ones Lost to AIDS, a collection of 77 essays, poems and stories from people sharing feelings of losing loved ones to AIDS, edited by Newman, will be released Saturday.

The Femme Mystique will follow on June 20. It is another anthology of different writers, this one from lesbians writing about the femme identity.

Newman is the author of novels, short stories, non–fiction workbooks, children's books, plays, a film and a young adult novel. She has also edited anthologies, and when not writing she teaches workshops.

Serious comedy

The issues Newman deals with are serious. Among other things, they cover Judaism and anti–Semitism, homosexuality and homophobia, body image and eating disorders. A device she often uses to communicate serious issues is comedy.

"Comedy brings light to a serious subject," Newman said. She explained that sometimes a serious message can be more effective with comedy.

Currently Newman is working on Out of the Closet and Nothing to Wear, which she describes as a fictional autobiography, blending fiction, non–fiction and humor. The book is a collection of pieces that have been published in syndicated gay and lesbian publications.

Newman said most of her books are both humorous and serious, but this is "basic humor." She described having to "constantly draw on the same emotion" an enjoyable challenge.

Versatility

When asked her favorite style of writing, she said, "all the forms have something that I like ... they feed each other."

Newman said that from poetry she has learned about putting imagery into fiction and from fiction has learned how to put narrative into her poetry. She explained that she likes writing children's books because they can be finished in a month, but she likes writing novels for the opposite reason — "being engaged in an ongoing project."

Newman's short story "A Letter to Harvey Milk," shows the versatility of Newman's writing.

First written in 1987, the story has since been included in three anthologies, won a prize, made into a film and developed into a play.

Crossing lines

Newman said there is homophobia in the Jewish community and ignorance in the lesbian and gay community about Jewish issues, so when she speaks to an audience, she sometimes has to "compartmentalize my identity."

When brought to speak, Newman said she respects the audience and wants to "entertain them, educate them [and] please them ... [but chooses] something that's appropriate for that particular audience."

She said that although she is never in the closet, it is sometimes "hard to be 100 percent myself."

The award–winning author said, "I never really consciously sit down and structure the way I'm going to write a book. It's really more of an organic process that uses the subconscious."

She said she doesn't think about the audience or publication, but immerses herself "in the story of the joy of telling the story."

As the author of the "second most challenged book in 1994," Heather Has Two Mommies, Newman said she tries not to control what she writes.

"I think its really important as a writer to shut off all voices ... I assume that whatever I write is going to offend somebody."

In the May/June 1994 issue of Poets and Writers Magazine, Newman said she doesn't write with a political agenda.

"[If] the books are political, they are so by the nature of the oppressiveness of our society. In an ideal society they wouldn't be political at all."

What is a Textbook Buyback?
The Textbook Annex now buys books from you on a daily basis. The best time however, to sell your books is at the end of the semester. At that time, the Annex will pay 50% of the new price for a book if we have an order for that book for the following semester and we need to purchase copies. If we do not, the wholesaler may make you an offer.
Wholesalers are in the business of selling used books to colleges and universities across the country. Therefore, in determining how much they will pay a student for a book they must consider the demand for that book as well as the shipping and handling costs involved in processing and reselling the book. This is why prices vary and indeed change frequently. Generally only current editions have value.
If you have any questions please ask the people doing the buyback at the Annex staff. They will be more than happy to answer your questions and give you any tips that may be applicable to your situation.

Monks perform healing rituals at Smith

By Ekra Miezan
Collegian Correspondent

On the evening of April 8, Wright Hall of Smith College was the scene of Sacred Music and Sacred Dance performed by Tibetan lamas, monks from the Drepung Loseling Monastery of the Monastic College of Dharmsala, India.

The monastery practices the three levels of Buddhism (Himayana, Mahayana and Vajaryana) with a distinct Tibetan cultural flavor.

Touring the world for the fourth time now, the monks have been performing their traditional temple music and masked dances to promote the healing of the world from environmental, social and spiritual problems. The Tibetan traditional temple instruments utilized in this performance were the Dung–chen (10–foot–long horn–like trumpets), Gyaling (a reed instrument), bells, cymbals and drums.

The performance was divided into two sessions. The first one was comprised of four healing rituals — Nyen–Sen, Sha–Nak Gar–Cham, Man–Del, and Yak Cham. Nyen–Sen, "The Invocation of the Forces of Goodness," was the prologue of the ceremony and was meant to stimulate creative awareness within the monks and the audience and enhance the spirit of goodness in the environment.

During the first section, the Man–Del ritual, the monks purified the universe. This was achieved by spiritually creating a world seen through the eyes of inner perfection. This world was then sent as a healing offering, symbolized by the holding of a silver base.

The Yak Cham, or Yak dance, caused the audience to rejoice. According to monk Namgyal, the Yak dance took on a special significance in the 17th Century, during the reign of the 6th Dalai Lama. The yak, an animal unique to central Asia, came to symbolize the Tibetan spirit of rugged strength and playfulness. The Yak dance underlined the fact that all life, including the animal kingdom, rejoiced when the human world entered a balanced life.

During the performance of this ritual, the white yak became excited to such an extent that it knocked down a flower pot in the corner of the stage. The yak left the stage to the heavy applause from the audience. Thus ended the first session.

After intermission, the second session began with Dak–Zin Tsar–Chod, the ritual of "Utterly Severing the Ego Syndrome." Six lamas and monks wearing head gear which hid their faces sat singing to the accompaniment of bells and drums. This meditative music was intended to mitigate, and possibly eliminate, the ego–clinging habit in human beings.

The session continued with Dur–Dak–Gar–Cham, "Dance of the Skeleton," to remind the world of the ephemeral nature of things. It was followed by Ten–Trul Yul–Tru, "Purifying the Environment and Its Inhabitants."

The last ritual of the healing performance was Seng–Geh Gar–Cham, "The Snow Lion Dance." The snow lion is an important symbol in Tibetan Buddhism and culture. It symbolizes the fearless and elegant quality of the enlightened mind. Two snow lions are also represented on the official flag of Tibet.

With Seng–Geh Gar–Cham, the monks demonstrated that when human beings maintain a harmonious environment through their creative activities, all living beings rejoice.

"From the bottom of my heart, I thank all of you who came tonight," said Namgyal before closing the rituals.

He said the presence of the audience meant that people care about the Tibetan plight. Namgyal took the opportunity to remind the audience that the rich culture of Tibet is now a vanishing world as a result of the Chinese occupation of the country since 1950. Tibetans who speak their native language are now socially underprivileged in Tibet, he said.

Namgyal said they have been in exile for 36 years. His own family fled to escape the Chinese oppression.

"I was conceived in Tibet and born in India," he told the audience. The healing of the world is also meant to turn Tibet into a zone of peace. According to Namgyal, a peaceful settlement of the Chinese occupation of Tibet will be beneficial not only to China and Tibet, but the neighboring countries of India and Pakistan will also benefit.

"We feel a complete lack of any governmental support," said Namgyal. Only Czechoslovakia has recognized Tibet as an independent country. India, Britain and the United States still consider Tibet a part of China.

Namgyal said the United Nations passed three resolutions in the early 1960s regarding Tibet. The United Nation's international committee of jurists also concluded that China was practicing a cultural genocide in Tibet.

Martin Lawrence and Will Smith take a break from television in Bad Boys.

Bad Boys makes for bad film

'Circle of Friends' fizzles due to underwhelming story

By Laura Stock and Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

BAD BOYS
Directed by Michael Bay
with Martin Lawrence, Will Smith
Playing at Mountain Farms Four Theaters

Martin Lawrence and Will Smith co–star in Lethal Weapon 4 (whoops, sorry!) Bad Boys — an action movie that keeps you in stitches more than on the edge of your seat.

While Bad Boys scores brownie points for being the premiere action flick of the summer, it will merely serve as a sacrificial lamb, not as a precedent to the block–buster action films due out in June.

Lawrence and Smith have good comical chemistry; however, their signature sitcom–style antics become strained as the movie plods on.

Their incessant, facetious banter adds to the problem of this film fitting like a square peg into the action genre.

On a cinematic spectrum, Bad Boys flounders somewhere between The Last Boy Scout and Beverly Hills Cop. This is not a compliment.

Lawrence is the married–with–children detective Marcus Burnett, while Smith is the sexy, smooth and wealthy bachelor detective Mike Lowrey.

To classify them in Lethal Weapon–esque terms, Lawrence plays the Danny Glover character and Smith plays the Mel Gibson character.

The two narcotics investigators are assigned by their stereotypical hot–tempered, do–nothing captain (Joe Pantoliano) to find out who pulled off the robbery of millions of dollars worth of confiscated heroin.

Because the carefully orchestrated theft of the Miami precinct appears to be an inside job, Internal Affairs is chomping at the bit to close down the station. This puts Burnett and Lowrey on a 72–hour deadline.

The events that ensue are filled with obligatory action movie stunts, but the car chases, shootouts and explosions are hard to take seriously with Lawrence and Smith constantly joking.

This movie serves as a how–to on making cliched action facial expressions — open mouth, wide eyes, raised eyebrows, flared nostrils — combined with a look of both fear and anger. These, along with the unbelievable stunts, are hardly convincing.

To complicate matters further (and to throw an annoying twist into the plot), a key murder witness named Julie (Tea Leoni) refuses to report what she saw to anyone but Lowrey.

Lowrey is in the hospital at the time and Burnett pretends to be him. For the duration of the movie, Burnett and Lowrey swap identities.

The role of women is somewhat disappointing in that they are portrayed as annoying, troublesome characters.

When Julie isn't meddling with Burnett and Lowrey's case, she is running around in a miniskirt, toting a gun bigger than her thigh, Burnett's wife Theresa is constantly whining to her husband that he does not give her enough "quality time" at inappropriate moments, which drastically interferes with his work.

It is extremely frustrating that both women are lied to throughout the movie, because it is the source of the detectives' problems.

Producers Don Simpson and Jerry Bruckheimer have not improved from their Beverly Hills Cop and Top Gun days, but rather regressed.

Bad Boys (which has been termed "an action comedy with attitude") is worth watching for laughs and for some interesting action sequences, but is not to be taken seriously.

Despite this, the worst part of the film has to be Smith and Lawrence humming the song from "Cops," drudging up all sorts of pop–cultural police television show notions.

"Bad boys, bad boys what'cha gonna do? What'cha gonna do when they come for you?" I'd run. C (L.S.)

CIRCLE OF FRIENDS
Directed by Pat O'Conner with Chris O'Donnell, Minnie Driver
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Some movies can slide by on their charm — despite pedestrian plotting and uninvolving characters. Circle of Friends is not one of those movies. While there's no doubting the doe–eyed appeal of Chris O'Donnell (Scent of a Woman) and newcomer Minnie Driver (soon to be seen in the new James Bond flick), not even their considerable chemistry can spark up this wee Irish love story.

Driver is an ugly duckling who falls in love with dreamboat pre–med stud O'Donnell in '50s Ireland and to her surprise he falls back. Her childhood friends are also lovestruck; one is involved in a torrid affair with a wealthy older man and the other tries to fend off the amorous charms of her sex–crazed mate. Meanwhile, Driver is being pushed into marrying her father's business partner, a creepy Pee–Wee Herman look–alike.

Will Driver and O'Donnell get together? Will the movie stop playing that tin whistle for one god–damn moment? Are you kidding?

Circle of Friends is the type of movie where, even though we know true love will triumph, we're supposed to pretend not to know and let the romance wash over us. Only in Friends, there's not much to occupy our time — the movie sputters along, throwing cartoon obstacles in the lovers' way only to have them resolved almost instantly (even the death of a character's parent is treated with a shrug).

The movie keeps telling us they belong together, instead of showing us why. It's easy to explain their attraction — this is a movie, isn't it? — but there's not much here to warrant them staying together. While it's nice to find a movie where love does win out in the end, blah blah, it's not good when it comes at the expense of the film's style, pacing or common sense.

Driver may be a new star to watch, but not in this movie. C+ (J.L.)

Junior Wells mixes blues with funk

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

JUNIOR WELLS
Pearl Street
April 10

On Monday night at Pearl Street Nightclub, Junior Wells and Ernie Williams both proved that age is not a factor when it comes to performing great music.

One of the greatest living bluesmen, Junior Wells, now 60, started his professional career when he was 12 years old, sitting in on harmonica with the legendary Muddy Waters. He took over for famous blues harpist Little Walter Jacobs that night and made 70 dollars in tips, almost three times Jacobs' usual amount. After Little Walter went solo a few years later, Wells joined officially while still in his teens.

On Monday, Wells performed with the same energy he had when he was still a kid in the '50s Chicago blues scene.

He shook his hips and hands around, preaching in his slick voice to some of his favorite originals, including "Mojo Hand," and one of his main signature songs, "Messin' With The Kid."

On "Little By Little," Wells got some help from the crowd, who sang along with him enthusiastically. It is hard to set aside those songs as being the best, though. The whole show had no flaws to be seen.

Wells' onstage persona is unbeatable. Short, skinny and in a jewel–laden hat, he continually prompted his equally amazing band to "cook!" or "c'mon! get that!" He eyes the crowd like a panther, and his words many times jumped out surprisingly to attack. One could only wish that he would have played his many harmonicas more.

His band was unequalled, and like the JBs (James Brown's original backing band), the JW Blues Band could definitely survive on their own. They did just that, opening the Wells set with three songs, without Wells even present.

A 10–year veteran of the band, drummer Willie Hayes played frantically and also sang low and smooth, while Joseph Burton, the band's trombone player for only the past few months, sang with a high, funky shout and played some of the most amazing solos of the night.

All of the eight band members showed a mastery of their instruments with a dirty, low–down funky blues jam that went on to near midnight.

Ernie Williams (in his 70s) proved to be a great bassist. His singing was rough around the edges but the message he was conveying came through loud and clear. He sang songs about being broke, being lonely and being drunk — three major pillars of the blues.

His band was middle–aged, a few decades younger than their leader. The two guitarists both soloed, with Joe Mele using a modern effect–laden sound, and Mark Emanation using a ripping, dirty sound. Rocky Petrocelli rounded out the lineup on drums.

Quintet's performance energetic

Hectic, precise playing delights crowd at woodwind concert

By Christopher Hassett

UNITED STATES AIR FORCE WOODWIND QUINTET
Bezanson Recital Hall
April 11

The United States Air Force Woodwind Quintet proved last Tuesday just how much noise five musicians can make when they work together.

The uniformed musicians played in front of more than 100 students at Bezanson Recital Hall in what was a truly amazing concert.

The performers dove into the first piece. If musicians could argue with notes, then the opening piece, written by Anton Reicha, would be the equivalent of a boxing match.

When one player finished a measure, another, seemingly trying to outdo the other, played another measure in response.

The concert heated up with the second piece, "Summer Music" by Samuel Barber.

Senior Master Sergeant Danny K. Phipps brought home the intended image of humid summer days with his deep, sustained bassoon playing.

Moving from the slow, hot, difficult–to–move image, the music sped up, calling to mind that time at the end of the summer when you know school is coming upon you.

Finally, much like summer itself, the piece ended with such abruptness that the audience had to wait two beats before they finally realized the music was over.

"Trois Pieces Breves," composed by Jacques Ibert, allowed the musical talents of Master Sergeant Lawrence Ink to be put to the test.

How can so much air be channelled through a flute and still come out as music at the other end? It may be a mystery but UMass saw it in action during this concert.

The music became a conglomerate of all the styles of the participating musicians and the composer, which resulted in a fast–paced, energetic piece reminiscent of violin music.

The performance managed to harness the band's manic delivery in a cohesive, artistic package that left the audience breathless as well as amazed.

Local quartet doing things their own Way

By Andrew Davidson
Collegian Staff

COURTESY ALAN SILVERMAN

Cameron's Way are one of the area's hardest working bands.

Cameron's Way is not your typical Amherst band. "We don't sound like Phish," said Todd Cuff, the band's rhythm guitar player.

"Hippies beware," added bass player Benjamin Murphy, who co-founded the band with vocalist Edmund Kelleher in September 1992.

The band's current line-up, with drummer J.J. O'Connell and lead guitarist Andrew Laurence, has been together since May 1993. In those two years, the band has begun to gel, creating a sound that includes all of the members equally.

This cohesiveness is evident in the band's songwriting. "Everybody in this band is a songwriter," Kelleher said.

"The songs are written by Cameron," joked Cuff. Typically, one of the band members comes up with an idea (none of them can agree on who develops the original ideas), but some songs are given a different treatment. "River," arguably one of their best songs, was originally a poem Kelleher wrote and the band set to music.

The band is tight on tape, but even more so on stage. Over the course of playing four shows in six days, the band improved their sound steadily during each of the shows.

In front of a mostly high school crowd during a Northampton Center for the Arts benefit show, the band seemed very deliberate. Three days later, they sounded a lot more cohesive during a rave at the Hatch, where a well- produced light show added to the quality of the performance.

"The lighting almost made the whole thing," O'Connell said. "I'm not even a big fan of the light show."

Their show at the Amherst Common the next day, despite being harassed by Amherst police, produced their best sound. Kelleher's vocals often switch between melodic verses and screaming choruses.

"When he gets in the heat of what he's saying, because they're his words, he screams a lot," O'Connell said. But Kelleher is often timid on stage, refusing to fully engage the crowd. "He's still not super-confident with his voice."

Kelleher was guarded when asked what his lyrics are about. "It's hard to say what I'm trying to say, because I don't know what I'm trying to say," he said. "I'm not going to write political songs, because I usually write about myself."

Cameron's Way has had to work hard to find places to play in the Valley.

"If you're a band trying to make it around here, you've got to play the four clubs," said O'Connell, referring to Pearl Street, The Iron Horse, Katina's and the Baystate Hotel. "Say you play the four clubs four weekends in a row. You can't play them again for two months. So then you've got to find other places to play."

The band has played a number of different venues, which they say has helped attract a broader audience. In the last three weeks, they have played an acoustic show in Butterfield, a bar at a bowling alley ("[Alley-Oops] has the potential to definitely be a cool spot," added Cuff), an outdoor set on the common, and a show at the Northampton Brewery.

But the band has had difficulty with the small market of the Amherst/Northampton area. "We've exhausted our possibilities around here," Kelleher said.

The band is starting to set its sights on the larger markets of New York and Boston. "There's no money in music around here," O'Connell said.

"The only money we make goes back into the band or into our gas tanks," Kelleher said.

Local bands have been difficult to team up with, which has been a little frustrating for the band.

"Somewhere along the line we got a bad rap with some bands — somehow," said Kellher.

And even though Murphy laments the scene across the river as an "exclusive, Northampton, art-rock wanna-be scene," he said "we're all for bands around here getting signed. If a band around here gets signed, we're psyched."

Cameron's Way will join Soup and Rippopatamus this Saturday at the Extravaganja on Metawampe lawn outside the Campus Center. The concert is sponsored by the Cannabis Reform Coalition.

body continues to doubt him and are ready to build tacky golden calfs the moment his back is turned. Talk about being cynical.

Elsewhere, there was a bit of good news for CBS last week. After months of mediocre episodes, I'm happy to say that "Picket Fences" is finally (with its recent episode tackling the subject of euthanasia) getting back on track as one of TV's wittiest dramas. Alas, CBS' overall quality continues to sink as one of the dullest courtroom shows in a long time, "The Wright Verdicts," joins its prime-time lineup.

Ironically, everything about this program seems wrong — starting with its incredibly boring star Tom Conti, who plays an overly polite, detached attorney who runs a small practice with the help of his equally uninteresting legal assistants.

These characters have absolutely no on-screen chemistry — most of the time, characters amble around lifelessly, regurgitating drab dialogue as though they were stuck in a bad PBS "Mystery" episode. Which is a surprise, since producer Dick Wolf is also the force behind NBC's intriguing, sharp-tongued cop drama "Law and Order." I suspect the big problem is that "Wright Verdicts" hasn't really decided whether it wants to be hard-edged or more laid-back — it tries to capture the urgency and lightly comic touch of "Picket Fences" (there were no less than two awkwardly executed vasectomy jokes in the most recent episode) but doesn't have the good acting or writing to pull it off.

NBC also had a couple of disasters on their hands this week, including what I hope was truly the final "Perry Mason Mystery Movie," with Hal Holbrook filling in for the sadly deceased Raymond Burr. I personally don't see any point in having a Mason mystery without the real Mason, and Hal just doesn't cut it in the pivotal role of defense attorney. So I'm hoping the network will follow through on its promise to make this production their last.

But there are even more problems to be had with Patty Duke's improbable new drama "Amazing Grace," about the trials and tribulations of a lady minister. Patty is fine in the lead role, but she's overwhelmed by the show's writers who obviously have no idea what they're doing. Like "The Wright Verdicts," this series is an uncomfortable mix of drama and comedy. And the result is a show that appears maudlin when it wants to be serious, and ridiculous when it wants to be funny.

For instance, last week's episode guest-starred Burt Reynolds as an obnoxious evangelist, whose joy in life is to bilk his admirers out of their life savings. Given that no program featuring the former "Evening Shade" star will ever be taken seriously, I nevertheless expected "Amazing Grace" to at least attempt a hard, satirical look at some of the less admirable, cultish aspects of organized religion — while targeting Burt as a hammy sinner in saint's clothing.

But instead, the show wraps itself up in a needlessly grim subplot about a woman whose daughter wants her declared mentally incompetent, and (after trying to redeem itself by throwing in a few flat gags about angels) later transforms Burt from a villain into a nice guy with almost no justification. What a waste of a sleazy guest-star. Maybe divine intervention could salvage this mess, but I wouldn't be too sure. Even Moses' powers has its limits.

Pavement's latest a tough listen

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

WOWEE ZOWEE
Pavement
Matador Records

After becoming the critic's darlings and the appointed torch bearers of a whole scene, there are two directions a young band can follow — the smoothly paved high road to the stars, or the rockier path to self-imposed obscurity.

Opting for the low road, and not surprisingly, is Pavement. Three years ago you couldn't pick up a music rag without gushing praise for the group spilling out into your lap, and after the virtual pop-bonanza of their last effort Crooked Rain, Crooked Rain, it seemed as if the world was their oyster.

Now, one year later, the backlash is about to begin. With Wowee Zowee, Pavement's third full-length release (if you count their Westing (By Musket and Sextant) compilation) the group has decided to bury all its beautiful pop hooks in a mucky mess of guitar noodling, cheesy sound effects and odd time signatures.

This apparent commercial suicide, at a point when they were teetering on the brink of success, is not a very difficult thing to figure out. Pavement has always been somewhat of an enigma, crafting melodies out of the most unlikely situations and disguising themselves in cryptic lyrics, album covers and liner notes. So what better way to give the finger to the almighty rock n' roll singer, than by taking a creative step backwards — deeper into obscurity.

To call Wowee Zowee a disappointment wouldn't be entirely misguided — the album does lack the cohesiveness of their previous work — content in playing a game of musical hopscotch through styles and attitudes instead of concentrating on the work as whole. But still, it would be a crime to dismiss the album as a failure or an experiment gone awry.

Wowee Zowee is far and away the most interesting of all of Pavement's efforts, a snobbish affair that finds the group (especially lead singer Steve Malkmus) lackadaisically shuffling through 18 tracks as though they don't have a care in the world. All the musical treasures are still here, folks — you just have to dig a bit further to find them.

The songs on Wowee Zowee hardly ever jump out and grab you with the off-kilter "ba da da's" that made Slanted and Enchanted and Crooked Rain such treats. Instead, songs meander along, content to just drift in and out of your conscience, and over before you realize you're still humming the tune. Tracks such as "AT &T" and "Rattled by the Rush" rank with the best Pavement tunes, drawing you in with their pop sensibilities before taking you on a ride through the band's warped vision of rock music. Other tracks are less obvious.

"Best Friends Arm," "Black Out" and "Grave Architecture" find the group treading less accessible ground, messing around with minor keys and almost free-form guitar slop, which at times grows tiresome, but is kept interesting by Malkmus' absurd attitude. He is definitely the ringleader here, tossing off sarcastic accents ("We Dance" and "Serpentine Pad") without a care, and coming off as the most completely pissy figure in rock music today. He wants to bug you, and by golly he does a damn good job.

The trick to listening to Wowee Zowee is to not get alienated by the band's stand-offishness, but rather try to get in on the joke — sure they may be laughing at you, but you can at least try to laugh with them. It's worth it. A–

VEE VEE
Archers of Loaf
Alias Records

Listening to Archers of Loaf is akin to buying generic products at the drug store — all the ingredients are there, but still somehow you can't help but feel you're getting ripped off.

The band has built their reputation by borrowing from every indie-supergroup of note. A little Pavement here, a little Superchunk there. Hey, who's counting? And even though the Archers' tunes are at times just as infectious as the aforementioned groups, they leave you with the overall sense that something is missing — sort of quirky rock by the numbers.

"The underground is overcrowded," sings lead singer Eric Bachmann on the track "Greatest of All Time," and that may just be the problem here. Although the Archers obviously mean what they are playing, the group can't seem to come out from behind the somewhat large shadows of their contemporaries.

Vee Vee is chock full of the band's potent pop/punk numbers (although this time around, concentrating on the punk side a bit more) and there really are some decent tunes. On first listen, songs such as "Nevermind The Enemy" and "Underachievers March And Fight Song" are just as good as anything out there today — but for some reason they just don't seem to make a lasting impression.

Everything is in place for the Archers to step up and take a spot on the Buzz Bin alter. They just need to find themselves a solid identity to work with. B –

Pearl Street, a crowd shuffles in for a concert by Leftover Salmon, and just further up the street at the Baystate Cabaret, music wafts out into the street as patrons wait at the bar inside for the club's nightly live music.

But if loud rock music isn't your thing, then there are plenty of alternatives. Hidden away amongst the crannies of the towns streets are little out of the way places such as the Haymarket and the Fire & Water cafe which attract flocks of college students looking for something a little different to do with their Friday night.

"There's always people here on a Friday night," said Star Drooker, owner of the Fire & Water. "It is a hang-out for people who don't drink and don't smoke."

In the small performance space that the Fire & Water claims, a folk singer rants about the pitfalls of being a folk singer while various clusters of twenty–somethings watch, draw and play chess.

Outside, as the night begins to wind down, the streets still remain full of people leaving the various shops and movie theaters which will soon close, and then heading off to whatever lies next on their night's agenda.

On a relatively quiet strip of Main Street, a one woman band who has spent the better part of the night performing for curious passers–by continues to play.

After a brief chat, it is revealed that the woman, who refers to herself as Mama Mariama, has traveled all over Europe and through many American cities. She is only visiting Northampton though she has been here a few times before.

"This is the second time that I've played in an American town, and it is not that bad," said Mariama. "I love Northampton — I think it's a great town."

And as people walk by the crash of Mariama's cymbals (she carries a drum on her back) is the last sound they hear on yet another Friday night.

options end.

"Entertainment is the main reason for renting," said Bousquet.

"There aren't that many parties around here," said Payne. "And this is the best place around to rent movies."

It certainly seems so this particular Friday night. People spill in from the streets, packing between the aisles, all aiming to take a quick glance at what they can't rent at the sparse pickings of the new release rack. The din from lines like "Did you ever see..." and "I heard this was pretty good" almost drowns out James Dean and Julie Harris swooning in a copy of East of Eden playing on the monitors.

Especially at Pleasant St., most customers are more willing to venture beyond the new releases, and with two floors and a decidedly eclectic selection, looking for a movie can be an all–night affair. Narrowing down choices naturally leads customers to seek the advice of the store's staff.

"I've had customers ask about a movie they saw when they were a kid and want to find it again and that's all the information they'll give," says Vdo.

"Or you'll have people ask, 'are you holding My Left Foot for me?' or 'where's Brazil?'," says staffer Patty Huff.

Misunderstandings are the most common, but Vdo can recall more serious incidents.

"I've seen couples get in fights, and we've had a few parents nearly forget their children," says Vdo.

Whatever happens, whether it's a mad dash for the recently returned copy of Priscilla, Queen of the Desert or a meaningful turtleneck discussion of Sam Fuller by the film noir section, Pleasant St. Video keeps its doors open. A downtown landmark, it makes its mark as a successful Friday night way station for area residents as well as the last — and more likely first — stop for week–weary cinephiles.

ous locations in the area, what do all these students crave? You guessed it — pizza.

"Everyone on campus seems to want pizza," said Glenn Spagnuolo, an Amherst resident and delivery driver for Pizza Hut. "After 12:00 at night it's hilarious, people are drunk and they can't count their money — I get huge tips."

So campus isn't the territory for losers on Friday night that many would like to categorize it as. Those who prefer the company of a few good friends rather than a few hundred strangers have found many ways to entertain themselves.

Also keep in mind that however bizarre it may seem — there's always homework.

ended up being sold out."

"Usually we go to parties or The Pub. Mostly we go some place local," said Qujada, a junior computer science major. "It depends on the day and if the place has music."

Qujada and Yousef both said that Amherst was kind of limited because the downtown area was so small.

"Barr, The Pub and Antonio's are pretty decent," said Orvis, a junior civil engineer major.

"We used to go to Boston," said Yousef. "It was a lot better and a lot more fun."

On the bus ride down Main Street passengers listened to a group of girls recount their evening's escapades as phrases like "So fine" and "so nice" were used to describe potential dates. Bruno's could be seen full of students carrying out pizza slices and drinks. Windows from houses threw light onto can–littered lawns while partygoers could be seen crushed up against the windows like sardines. The bus door opens admitting a passenger and the pounding bass line of some nondescript song pours in as a car drives by. The bus driver closes the door and waves to a fellow driver, his bus crammed with returning students.

Rather than fight the horde of people racing to Antonio's amidst the paper plate coated sidewalk adhered with congealing strings of cheese and sauce, last stop was Mike's Billiard's. There a more sedate crowd gathered around lit pool tables and a few brave souls, made bold by fermented grain crooned along to the weekly kereoke night.

"My friends and I go here because it's more laid back and not as crowded," said Jody Duval, a senior HRTA major. "It's not like uptown. There it's kind of political and cliquey with people having friends who cut ahead and stuff."

Duval believed the atmosphere was attributed to more real people and locals that mixed well with the college students.

"It's just less crazy then uptown. Mike's Westview is a pretty good place too, it has the same atmosphere," said Duval.

And so last call was heard here as patrons racked up one last game, bought one last round and the kereoke machine was clicked off until next Friday night.

KENNEDY PLEDGES SUPPORT FOR KAPLAN

BOSTON – Representitives of Kaplan Educational Centers were recently invited to meet with Senator Ted Kennedy in Boston.

In February, Kennedy wrote a letter to Amherst Kaplan Director Dean Graziano expressing his support of Kaplan's efforts to prepare students for the future.

On February 25, Kaplan offered free diagnostic tets, called "Test Drives," to students at locations nationwide. The Test Drive provided students with a chance to see hown they would score on standardized admissions tests, including the GRE, GMAT, MCAT, LSAT and SAT. Locally the Test Drives were administered by the University of Massachusetts, Williams College, and Bay Path College.

Kennedy stated to Graziano and Kaplan's Northeast Regional Director, Rob Waldron that due to the success of the Test Drive, he woiuld be a continual supporter of this event. Graziano and Waldron presented Kennedy with a plaque honoring his support to Kaplan.

Former administrators reminisce at reunion

By Rana Meyer
Collegian Correspondent

A reunion for retired administrators of the 1960s and '70s was held at the University of Massachusetts earlier this week. Over 75 attended.

The reunion was organized by Gerald Grady, a former UMass administrator who said that churches and students hold reunions, but administrators never do.

"I wanted everyone to be able to see each other again," he said. "It gave everyone the chance to renew friendships, socialize and talk about the old times."

The event began with a commemoration of the passing of the Fiscal Autonomy Act in 1962, which was followed by comments from those attending and with a banquet dinner along with speeches by Chancellor David K. Scott and some of the former administrators in attendance.

The fiscal autonomy bill called for removal of administrative controls, the right to transfer funds for subsidiary accounts, elimination of a pre–audit and creation of new trust funds.

Grady said that the night was everything that he hoped it would be.

"There was a very good feeling among the speakers and the audience," Grady said.

Leo Redfern, who was director of institutional studies and dean of administration during the '60s, thought the reunion was a great idea.

"I live in Maine, so I don't get down often," he said.

Redfern said he noticed many changes when he returned to the UMass campus.

"The campus has softened and there are so many new buildings," Redfern said. "They were just finishing the library when I left."

Another administrator who attended the reunion was former president of UMass, John Lederle. He said he was very happy when he heard about the reunion.

"I think it's great to be able to join with friends and associates who I worked with when we were building the University," Lederle said. "It's wonderful to see old friends, it is like a different type of college reunion."

According to Maurice Donahue, former head of the Institute for Governmental Services and former president of the Massachusetts Senate, the reunion was really celebrating the fact that 25 years ago, the fiscal autonomy bill was passed.

"The fiscal autonomy bill allowed the state budget to be appropriated, so that the administration would have the freedom of how it was going to be spent," Donahue said. "It was one of the greatest advances in public education at that time."

Grady said the bill passed mainly because of Donahue.

"He contributed more to higher education than anyone else and he gave so much support," Grady said.

After the autonomy bill was passed, Donahue filed the bill that established UMass–Boston and he was also head of the committee that established the UMass Medical School.

"The fiscal autonomy bill is still in effect today, but it is not as effective as it was," Donahue said. "Too many restrictions have been put on it."

Donahue said he thinks the reunion was a fine idea, but with all of the talent present, it should be put to work to solve the problems of today.

"I'm happy to reminisce, but after tonight, we should meet to say how we can help UMass," Donahue said. "That would be the real benefit of this reunion."

Windmill to be erected again

By Purva Panday
Collegian Correspondent

The Renewable Energy Research Lab at the University of Massachusetts is preparing to remount the windmill that sits atop Mt. Tom.

Faculty and graduate students in the School of Engineering and Department of Mechanical Engineering at UMass have been involved in the windmill's establishment and upkeep for the past few years.

The windmill was taken down for a routine maintenance check–up on March 21, according to Tony Ellis, a mechanical engineering graduate student and the mechanical and tool manager of the project.

The windmill, which weighs 10 tons and sits on an 80–foot tower, has blades that are 80 feet long from tip to tip, according to Ellis.

"The windmill is a prototype machine that was used on a wind farm in California," Ellis said. "In 1991, it was moved to Massachusetts."

The windmill is mainly used as a research platform and a source of power to the Mt. Tom Ski Area. It is capable of 250 watts of power, said Ellis.

The project, which is overseen by Jim Manwell, an assistant professor of mechanical engineering, uses funds from various sources, according to Ian Baring–Gould, a mechanical engineering graduate and the site and financial manger of the project.

"Thus far, the entire project has cost nearly $120,000. Funding has come from the UMass Foundation, Daniell O'Connell Sons Construction Co., the Mt. Tom Ski Area, and grants from the state," Baring–Gould said. "Only $3–400 has gone to the maintenance we are working on now. We should have the windmill back up by Wednesday."

■ vandalism

Auxiliary services gives the revenues from the machines late in the summer. Student affairs allocates the funds in early September, according to Robinson.

According to Wilkes, approximately 75 percent of the profits from the vending machines goes into the fund, the rest is for the vending companies.

Even with the vulnerability of the machines on a college campus, companies jump at the chance to put their equipment in such a populated area, Wilkes said.

"When we were asking for bids, many companies went after it," Wilkes said. "They still make money off of it — if they didn't, they wouldn't do it."

If an area continuously gets hit with vandalism, the machine is removed, Wilkes said.

"We get calls and people say they want the machine," Wilkes said. "We say, 'Hey, you didn't take care of it.'"

SGA to redesign Greek by–law; judiciary approves elections

By Jessica Taverna
Collegian Staff

The Student Judiciary announced last night that it has ordered the Student Government Association (SGA) to redesign a by–law that will mean less student representation from the Greek area.

In their first ruling of the 1994–95 academic year, the judiciary determined that any SGA senators representing portions of the Greek area do so in compliance with the by–laws of the SGA constitution, according to Chief Justice Steven Cohen.

The by–law referenced states that each senate seat be allotted for every 250 students. Currently, 18 senators represent the Greek area's population of 600, Cohen said.

Part of the judiciary's solution to this imbalance is to have the Greek area's title changed to the "extra residence hall on campus" area, in essence, changing the wording of the by–law in question. There are three areas now — the commuter area, the residence hall area and the Greek area.

According to Jeff Davis, a freshman senator from John Adams Residence Hall, the judiciary's decision is "near– sighted."

"By creating senator seats just according to districts," Davis said, "direct, efficient communication to constituents has been cut off."

Attorney General Phil McNamara also asked that the judiciary assess whether former SGA Speaker Mercedes Betanco and former associate speaker, now speaker, Tom Darby's actions in holding recent senator elections were in violation of SGA rules and regulations.

The judiciary ruled that because the SGA was going through a transitional period with its new constitution, the association was allowed to do what it needed to for the interim period and the two are not guilty of any violations.

The Greek senators who are now in place and were elected prior to the judiciary's hearing will not be removed from their posts.

The Rules and Ethics Subcommittee will be responsible for redesigning the by–law by May 6.

"They see a lot of shots in practice. They deserved the opportunity and they did a great job today."

Defensively, while Cannella returned his regulars to the field on a couple of man-down opportunities, they got strong performances from seldom-used defenders who stood out in limited action.

After seeing the bench in action the team is comfortable that those players could step up in crucial situations if called upon.

"It's a great opportunity for them to play and gain some experience," Cannella said.

"They looked real good," Glass said.

"It's good to know that if someone gets hurt that you've got guys that can step right in there."

Around the bases: Freshman Kim Gutridge has made an immediate impact. The first baseman is third on the team with a .320 batting average and 31 hits while playing solid defense committing just seven errors for a .974 fielding percentage, best among Minutewomen starters. Gutridge also leads the team in doubles with nine.

In UMass' doubleheader sweep against Vermont, Gutridge went 5–8 with three RBIs, a double and a run scored ... Fellow freshman Tracey Osier is fourth on the team in batting with a .308 average. In UMass' doubleheader split against UConn, Osier came up big, going 3–7 in the two games while knocking in two runs ...

Sophomore Chris Martens is still the team's leading batter with a .391 average. She is second on the team in hits (36) and RBIs (23) but leads the team with three home runs ... Stephanie Marcina continues to improve offensively. After hitting just .150 last year, the sophomore is batting .257 so far this year and has already eclipsed her hit total of last year (20) with 26 hits so far this season.

at 9:21, teeing up from 30 yards off to Geisler's right for a 6–1 advantage. And at 11:22, Casey Costello slid out of the right corner to the goalmouth and scored his third of 1995.

UNH managed but two possessions in the offensive zone in the second quarter.

Kevin Ratkiewicz relieved Kasselakis at the start of the second half and UNH got back on the board at last at 3:41, when Mike McCulloch spun free of many checkers.

But UMass had already scored twice in the half's first two minutes, with Murphy scoring again from Triolo at 1:29 and Brendan Glass scored his first of five third quarter goals (season high) at 1:59.

UMass got its only extra man advantage goal at 4:36, on a play similar to the one that set up Stanziale. This time Hoffman sent a distant pass to Mike Valente, who only had to drop it in from a few feet away.

Glass took a bouncing pass from Stanziale at 7:28 and tucked a low 15-yard shot past Geisler for an 11–2 lead.

"Offensively in the first half, we were kind of all over the place, but in the second half we settled down," Glass said.

Glass started up again at 10:41, cutting to the net and converting in spite of constant checking.

Eighteen seconds later, Glass broke the defense again, with Sussi timing his assist to hit Glass at the end of his cut.

At 13:16, Glass scored his 15th goal of the season, again from Stanziale and again without defensive pressure.

Little used backups Bob Lukacz, Brian Turk and Jared Hand scored in the fourth quarter.

The Kansas City Star reported the announcement will be at noon on Tuesday at Justin Herman Plaza in San Francisco. Then Montana will fly to Kansas City for a news conference. The Star also reported Wednesday that NBC has been negotiating with Montana to join the network as a football commentator. Montana, the paper added, also has talked with the NFL about becoming a league spokesman.

Montana, who spent two years with the Chiefs after leading the 49ers to four Super Bowl championships, is retiring at 38 because of aches and pains as well as the wishes of his wife, Jennifer. The Washington Post, in today's editions, said Montana also was troubled by the rigorous practice schedule of Chiefs coach Marty Schottenheimer.

"This has been a done deal for a long time," a source close to Montana told the Post. "After last season he knew."

"At the end of the year, his friends in Kansas City were telling me that Joe was just tired, really tired," said Dave Huffman, a friend of Montana's and a former teammate at Notre Dame. "This shouldn't surprise anybody."

Now he'll have the chance to wow them for Duke.

Matthew Christensen, a center on the Belmont High School Varsity basketball team, announced Wednesday that he plans to attend Duke University in the fall.

The 6-foot-10, 240-pound Belmont resident made the announcement with his coaches surrounded by his family, students and friends at Wenner Field House at the high school.

"I felt like that was the place where I was most comfortable," said Christensen, 17. "I was thinking about it a lot and praying about it. I feel like the team there is real tight knit, like a family," Christensen said.

Christensen's teams went 88-11 throughout his high school career. He also led the team to the state championships his sophomore year.

Christensen isn't only talented on the court - he's graduating in the top 20 percent of his class. When he enters Duke, where he plans to major in engineering, he'll do it with a year's worth of advancement placement credits.

After he graduates from college, he says he wants to play professional ball.

"That's my goal. That's my dream. I feel like that's something I could do. That's my aspiration," he said.

Christensen's basketball and academic talents may run in the family.

His father Clayton, played for Brigham Young University and for Oxford University where he was a Rhodes scholar.

Lowell hopes to have AHL in 1996

LOWELL, Mass. (AP) — Even though this Merrimack River city is not on the American Hockey League's list of expansion sites for the 1995-96 season, city officials are hopeful they can attract a franchise by the time they open a new arena in September 1996.

The AHL's board of governors, which voted Tuesday to award franchises to Baltimore and Lexington, Ky., told Lowell officials to reapply next year for a team that could begin playing in the 1996-97 season.

Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Washington, Phoenix and both New York teams voted against the move. Los Angeles Raiders owner Al Davis abstained, as he did in Phoenix.

"I'm not for it," Steelers owner Dan Rooney said. "You've got to support the fans. The fans in Los Angeles supported the Rams for years."

Sports agent Leigh Steinberg of Save the Rams felt betrayed. "Clearly, the league has decided here that the violation of their guidelines governing franchise relocation isn't important," Steinberg said. "The NFL's got some mighty tall explaining to do as to how violations of their own relocation policy by the Rams suddenly became acceptable."

The move also is apparently tied to the construction of a stadium for the Los Angeles Raiders at Hollywood Park, which would guarantee an NFL franchise in the area.

Minutemen crush New Hampshire

■ Men's lacrosse rebounds from loss to Duke to win, 19-5

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

DURHAM, N.H. — In order for David to slay Goliath, he's got to have some stones.

The University of New Hampshire men's lacrosse team was powerless to extend a momentary upset bid and fell to No. 10 University of Massachusetts, 19–5, on rain–dampened Mooradian Field yesterday.

The Wildcats (3–6) made good on their first extra man opportunity just 1:45 into the chilly contest, as top scorer Dave Hanchett (25 goals) swept in a rebound that last-minute starter John Kasselakis chased out of the crease.

Massachusetts	19
New Hampshire	5

Each member of the UNH attack then performed an Oscar– worthy Rip Van Winkle role. UMass (3–2) reeled off nine straight scores that quickly erased any chance of an upset.

"We knew after that loss to Duke we had to come out and beat this team considerably," sophomore reserve attack Ken Sussi said after a career day with two goals and two assists. "We knew we were stronger than them. You've got to put out the teams your supposed to put out."

All 36 Minutemen saw action yesterday, and one of Sussi's second string teammates got the ball rolling, right past UNH goaltender Steve Geisler at 6:44, when Henry Stanziale (one goal, three assists) netted a long Dennis Kelly feed from the doorstep.

UNH's Scott Parent had a clean look at regaining the lead for the underdogs at 7:31, but his outside shot sailed wide.

UMass' defense suffered no further lapses, putting the clamps on UNH for the next three and a half quarters.

One of the backline's best, Greg Macdonald, rewarded himself with a goal on his second shot of the season, his second career strike on just three attempts. Moving through the slot to his left, Macdonald whipped in a bouncing ball.

The slippery grass helped swell Jeremy Murphy's recovering left knee, and he needed three bids before scoring the first of two goals, his eighth and ninth.

First Stanziale sailed a pass over Murphy's head on a 2–on–1, then Murphy flailed an open shot low and away. But at 12:08, Murphy fooled everybody for another free chance that he didn't miss. Eric Triolo assisted the goal.

The tape of Chris Grande's fourth goal at 12:52 will demand multiple viewings. Grande cut through the defense and flipped underhanded a one–handed shot in the top shelf.

The second quarter was more of the same, as three more Minutemen scored to bring the lead to 7–1 at half, with UMass cruising on the strength of seven different scorers.

At 4:25, Buddy Hoffman turned a ground ball into a low, 20–yard blast. Triolo might have won a shot velocity contest

Reserves display talent in Massachusetts victory

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

DURHAM, N.H. — Despite the fact that Massachusetts led 14–2 going into the final period, New Hampshire coach Jim Urquhart left his starters in the game, to face the Minuteman bench in hopes of making the score more respectable for his squad.

It didn't happen.

While most of Massachusetts' regulars watched the end of the rainy contest from the sideline. Their replacements made the most of their playing time, as they continued the onslaught in the fourth quarter.

After UNH scored 16 seconds into the fourth quarter, Massachusetts took to the offensive again.

The Minuteman bench outscored the Wildcat regulars five–to–three in the final period.

Sophomore attacker Ken Sussi displayed his talents as a passer and scorer collecting two goals and two assists in the final period. His performance prompted the team's leading scorer, another sophomore, Brendan Glass to praise Sussi's performance.

"I was joking around that Sussi and me are going to be close next year," Glass said. "He's got great eyes. He's going to be a really good feeder. In the next two years we're going to be working a lot together."

"It was a good feeling," Sussi said. "Coming off the bench, you're cold, but once you're get the feel of the game, you get confidence."

"I thought [both goalies] played real well," Cannella said. "They work their butts off all year. They see a lot of shots in practice."

His play was not lost on his coach either.

"Ken Sussi did a good job hustling out there, and getting a couple goals," Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella said after the game.

Freshmen Bob Lukacz and Jared Hand both scored their first collegiate goals early in the quarter.

Junior midfielder Brian Turk, who has battled back from a knee injury that caused him to miss most of the 1993 campaign and all of last season, netted his first goal in almost two years.

Every player on the Massachusetts roster, with the exception of No. 1 goaltender Tom LoPresti say action in the game.

LoPresti sat out with a hamstring injury he suffered in UMass' 9–8 loss to Duke leaving freshman John Kassalakis and sophomore Kevin Ratkiewicz to man the goal.

Kassalakis started and, after getting beaten on a fluke goal early, settled down to shut down the Wildcats for the rest of the half. The Manhasset, N.Y., native was pleased with his first extended action.

"It felt good that no one missed a beat with me in there," he said.

Ratkiewicz replaced the freshman for the second half and successfully protected the Minuteman lead, despite having a less experienced defense in front of him.

"I thought [both goalies] played real well," Cannella said.

Jette and Minutemen sweep Rhode Island

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

speed n. to help to succeed; aid.

Ryan Jette is speed for the University of Massachusetts baseball team in more ways than one and he continued his torrid pace, aiding the Minutemen in a doubleheader sweep of the University of Rhode Island in Kingston, R.I., yesterday.

Jette, the junior left fielder, raised his team leading average to .479 by going 5–for–8 in the two wins, driving in three runs, scoring another three and stealing two bases as the Minutemen (16–6, 10–1 Atlantic 10) extended their winning streak to 12 games.

In the opener, senior left-hander Jeff Michaels (2–0) limited the Ram offense to just three runs on three hits in a seven–inning complete game, whiffing seven while walking three in the 10–3 victory. Michaels hit a home run in the second game when he returned to his regular position of first base, going 1–for–3 with two runs batted in and a run scored.

Sophomore Jason Bennett (3–0) picked up a 7–4 victory in the nightcap, scattering five hits while allowing four earned runs in six innings of work. The nightander won his second straight start for Massachusetts, striking out three and walking two. Sophomore Chad Sullivan pitched the seventh inning to notch his first save of the season.

Massachusetts got its shortstop and number two hitter back in the form of Mark Pileski, who had missed the last three games due to a sprained ankle. The junior went 4–for–9 with a double, two RBIs, two runs scored and a stolen base.

With Pileski back in the line–up, third baseman Brad Corrie moved down to the eighth spot in the batting order and, despite the move, continued his hot hitting. The sophomore collected two hits in each of the games against the Rams, knocking in two runs and scoring three.

In the second game, catcher Andy Pelis blasted a HR, his second in four days; he went 3–for–6 on the day with two RBIs and two runs scored.

Diamond Notes

Massachusetts returns to conference action this weekend in Pittsburgh, Pa., as the Minutemen battle Duquesne in a three–game series (a doubleheader on Friday and a single– game on Saturday). The probable starting rotation on the mound for the Minutemen against the Dukes will be ace Jay Murphy, Chad Paronto and Scott Barnaby.

Daut is A–10 Pitcher of the Week for third time

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

Senior hurler Kelly Daut was named the Atlantic 10 Conference Pitcher of the Week for the third straight time this year for her 3–0 record last week.

Daut, the 1994 A–10 Conference Pitcher of the Year, posted victories against Hartford (5–1), St. Bonaventure (9–1) and Vermont (7–0), improving her team leading record to 13–5. In 19 innings of action, she allowed only two earned runs and five hits while striking out 23 batters.

Against Hartford on April 6, Daut struck out a career–high 11 batters while walking none. Her previous career–high for strikeouts was 10 against Army during the 1992 season. Against Vermont three days later, she threw her second shutout of the season pitching a one–hitter.

For the season, Daut has a 1.07 ERA, 86 strikeouts and has given up only 18 earned runs in 117 and one–third innings pitched.

Hot at the hot corner: Third baseman Sam Cardenas has been on a tear. In Tuesday's doubleheader split against Connecticut, the sophomore extended her hitting streak to 18 games with a single in the first game and a double in the second. Cardenas needs to get a hit in 10 more games to break the UMass school record held by Barb Marean, who had a 27–game hitting streak during the 1992 season.

For the season, Cardenas is the team's second leading hitter with a .365 batting average. She leads the team in hits (38), RBIs (24), triples (3) and runs scored (24), and is second on the team in home runs (2) and doubles (8).

CANDICE FLEMMING / COLLEGIAN
Freshman first baseman Kim Gutridge is third on the team in batting average, hitting .320 while leading the team in doubles with nine.

Montana to retire next week

By Steve Wilstein
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Joe Montana's anticipated retirement from football will become a reality next week with a public sendoff in San Francisco, the Associated Press has learned.

Montana's fans will be able to say goodbye in a downtown ceremony, followed by a formal farewell at a luncheon gala to be attended by former teammates and executives of the San Francisco 49ers and the Kansas City Chiefs. The ceremony is being coordinated by international Management Group, the company that has long represented Montana, an IMG representative told the AP.

IMG confirmed that Montana would announce his plans in San Francisco next Tuesday. But Montana, in San Jose for a police benefit Tuesday, wouldn't say whether it was so.

"I can't say it ain't or It is," he said.

When asked whether he'd be attending the Chiefs quarterback camp next week, he said, "I haven't had to go to one yet. I'm hoping I don't have to go that one either."

The exact day of Montana's announcement will depend on when the participants can arrive, but it will likely be Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday.

Chiefs president and general manager Carl Peterson had no comment today at a news media session the team had previously scheduled to discuss the upcoming draft.

"I will make this statement — that we will have a press conference here [Arrowhead Stadium] next Wednesday, probably at 10 a.m., specific to the status of Joe Montana," Peterson said.

Earlier in the session, Peterson had said, "Quarterback is not a concern to us. We're happy with our quarter-

Owners approve Rams' relocation to St. Louis

By R.B. Fallstrom
Associated Press

IRVING, Texas (AP) — The Rams will play in St. Louis this year after all.

A month after barring their move from Southern California, owners voted 23-6 on Wednesday to relocate the Rams to St. Louis, the first time an NFL team has left the West Coast.

The Rams, St. Louis officials and even the Missouri attorney general had threatened to sue the league if it blocked the move. "The game is over and I won't say we won but ... well, I guess we won one," Rams owner Georgia Frontiere said. "I think we all won."

The Rams agreed to pay $30 million to the league to get the owners to reverse a 21-3 vote last month in Phoenix. The 23 votes Wednesday was the minimum needed.

Commissioner Paul Tagliabue said the reversal, which will leave the NFC West with only one team west of St. Louis, was more an attempt to avoid a lawsuit than about the money.

"The decision to have peace and not to have war was a big factor," Tagliabue said.

Bruins sign Oates to 5–year deal

BOSTON (AP) — Center Adam Oates and the Boston Bruins have agreed in principle on a five-year contract that would pay him about $10 million.

Harry Sinden, president and general manager of the National Hockey League club, met Tuesday with Brian Cook, the lawyer who represents Oates, to iron out final details.

The contract would run through the 1998-99 season and would pay Oates a prorated $1.85 million for the current season; $1.95 million next season; $2.05 million for 1996-97; $2.15 million for 1997-98, and, depending on his production that season, the same amount for 1998-99.

"The term is exactly what we were shooting for," Cook said.

"Harry didn't have to pay him more this year or next (because Oates was under contract), but the fact that he was willing to, told us it would be a different kind of negotiation."

"An attempt by a team to get a player cheaply or a player's attempt to get more than he's worth ends in disaster," Sinden said.

"Adam was very understanding. He looked for a deal that would satisfy him and also one the club would feel it was getting its money worth," he said.

Oates, 32, said he will have surgery on a finger on his right hand after this season.

He hurt the finger last May in a playoff game against Montreal.

Pena signed to minor league contract

FORT MYERS, Fla. (AP) — The Boston Red Sox signed relief pitcher Alejandro Pena to a minor-league contract on Wednesday and are circling around yet another right-hander for a bullpen largely lacking in lefties.

Pena, 35, had seven saves and a 5.02 ERA for Pittsburgh last season after spending all of 1993 on the disabled list. In a 13-year career with the Dodgers, Mets, Braves and Pirates, he has appeared in four NL playoffs and three World Series.

He will work out at the major-league camp and, if he makes the team, earn $400,000 with a chance at another $350,000 in incentives.

The Red Sox are also interested in Luis Aquino, who was 2-1 with a 3.73 ERA in 29 games with the Florida Marlins last season. He pitched mostly in middle relief, allowing 22 walks and striking out 22 in 39 innings and holding opposing batters to a .210 average. Bob Schaefer, Boston's minor league director, worked with Aquino in the Kansas City system and has had favorable things to say about him.

"There's some interest there," manager Kevin Kennedy said. "I'm not saying we've talked to him but it's somebody that's been discussed."

■ Violence against women target of rally; hundreds speak out

By Colleen D. Shanahan and Emily Marino
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — "Strong, angry women unite" was plastered on the backs of more than 300 women and men gathered last night to take back the night.

Take Back the Night, an annual event sponsored by many local agencies, businesses and organizations, consisted of two rallies and a candlelight march offering battered women and their supporters empowerment in the fight to end domestic violence.

"Take Back the Night is a chance for women to unite and say 'We're not going to take it [violence against women],'" said Deb O'Donoghue, a senior at the University of Massachusetts and one of the organizers of the event.

Rally turnout high

O'Donoghue said she was excited about the turnout for the rally despite the threat of rain. She voiced the sentiments of many who were pleased with the number of men present at the rally.

"Women have been doing this kind of work for decades," said Ben Zeman, a UMass graduate student and only male member of the rally's coordinating committee. "I think it's time for men to do a little bit of catch up work, and that's why I'm here. We need men to stand up by themselves as men to stop sexism in other men."

The first rally, held on the lawn at the Unitarian Universalist Society, featured speakers telling stories of their own survival, as well as members of the Alliance for Economic Justice who took the opportunity to bash the Republican welfare reform proposals.

Yoko Kato, owner of Fashions by Yoko, told the rapt crowd of her daughter Sherry and grandson Cedric's murders at the hands of Sherry's husband. No one heard Sherry's cries or helped her. In a tearful plea, Kato begged the crowd not to ignore the screams of a woman and to call the police.

Some members of the crowd agreed there is currently a lot of apathy in society that prevents people from helping one another in violent situations.

"I think a lot of people don't want to become involved," said Marta Bilodeau, a Florence resident. "They are really hurting themselves, because we're all in this together."

Diverse paths to empowerment

Following Kato's speech, the Spirit of the Heart Kung–Fu and Empowerment Center performed a martial arts routine. The performance by the groups re–enacted violent scenes and their survival techniques through martial arts.

"The representation is a celebration of hope and light and love in the eyes of all children," said Nancy Rothenberg, founder and director of the group, who founded the organization to teach men and women how to be safe and protect themselves.

Robin, a mother of one of the performers said, "I wanted Marta to be prepared for a world which seems, well, not so safe anymore."

Also featured was a clothesline laden with t–shirts in remembrance of women and children who did not survive their abuse, and several reaffirming they will never again tolerate the abuse.

"Each color represents the numerous forms abuse can take; it is a very powerful representation," said Donna Moffo, an organizer of the project.

After the rally participants lit candles and began a march through Northampton, to be followed by a second rally and coffeehouse. The event drew many supporters who emphasized the need for more wide–spread involvement.

"I think people misunderstand the whole concept of why people stand up for what they believe," said Becky Tonello, a UMass sophomore. Her Sigma Kappa sister, Bethany Roe, agreed.

"People think the homosexual community comes to stand up for women's rights, and they're not the only people who have problems with the way women are treated," said Roe. "Basically, women are women."

India Nite festivities to kick off Sunday

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

The India Student Association (ISA) will present the five college area with Indian music, culture, film and food in its seventh annual India Nite this Sunday.

India Nite will begin with a cultural show featuring traditional music and dance reflecting the rich heritage of the Indian sub–continent, said Srihari Cadambi, president of the ISA. All students are invited to attend, free of charge.

"When people travel far away from their country, they have a periodic desire to return to where they came from," Cadambi said.

After the cultural show is an optional buffet featuring several typical Indian foods. The cost of this vegetarian buffet is $5, Cadambi said.

Part of the proceeds will go to Volunteers in Service for Education in India, a charitable organization dedicated to help educate poor students in India, said Mohan Kamath, member of the ISA who is volunteering his skills as a chef for India Nite.

"This is an attempt to assimilate our culture to the dominant American culture," Cadambi said. "It also feels good to have a get together and have fun. It serves a dual purpose."

An Indian movie will follow the buffet which may have English sub–titles, Cadambi said.

According to Cadambi, past India Nites have attracted as many as 400 faculty and students from the f've college area. India Nite begins at 6 p.m.

India Nite festivities will take place in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Auditorium starting at 6 p.m.

PLO crackdown sharply criticized

By Donna Abu-Nasr
Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — Muslim militants accused the PLO yesterday of conspiring with Israel to "wage war against Islam," while divisions arose among the Palestinian police over how hard to crack down on the radicals.

To prevent more attacks, Israel said it was banning all Palestinians, even those with work permits, from entering during the week-long Passover holiday, which begins today.

The pace of Yasser Arafat's operation against militants in the PLO-run Gaza Strip slowed on Thursday, with police making only six arrests.

Nearly 200 supporters of Hamas and Islamic Jihad have been detained since the fundamentalist groups claimed responsibility for two suicide bombings in Gaza Sunday that killed seven Israelis and an American student.

But most have been released and none of those jailed were from the groups' underground military wings, which have attacked Israelis in an effort to halt Israel-PLO peacemaking.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said it was too early to judge whether Arafat was carrying out his promise to disarm the militants. "The test isn't in one or two days," he said.

Senior Palestinian police officers, speaking on condition of anonymity, described the latest crackdown as merely a show of force by Arafat, the PLO chief.

One senior officer said Arafat had overruled his own police chief, Maj. Gen. Nasr Youssef, who wanted a harsher crackdown on hard-core activists. He said divisions were growing between Arafat and his senior commanders in the Palestinian police, a paramilitary force that helps ensure Arafat's grip on power.

The commanders were former guerrillas who came to Gaza from other Arab countries, the officer said, while the bulk of the force was recruited in Gaza itself and opposes taking a hard line.

A Hamas fugitive shot and wounded two Palestinian policemen early Thursday when they tried to arrest him, Israel Radio said.

Thursday's arrests included two editors of the Hamas-run Al-Watan newspaper, which had published an editorial accusing Arafat's Palestinian authority of copying the tactics of Gaza's former Israeli occupiers.

"They have both agreed to wage war against Islam," the editorial said.

"The Palestinian authority wants the settlements to remain, Jewish patrols to roam our streets, and our daily living to remain in the hands of those who have no mercy. But the people are stronger than they think and this will not succeed."

Also Thursday, the FBI joined the investigation of the bombing that killed 20-year-old Alisa Flatow of West Orange, N.J.

The American agents spent the day at Israeli police laboratories in Jerusalem, examining autopsy reports, photographs, and shrapnel fragments removed from Flatow's body, and meeting with terrorism and explosives experts.

They were to go to the Erez junction, on the border with Gaza, to meet with Palestinian authorities.

Congress passed a law in 1986, during a wave of Mideast hostage-taking, that gives the United States authority to prosecute suspects in terrorist attacks on American citizens abroad.

Palestinian police official Rashid Abu Shbak said the FBI would not be able to conduct its own investigation, but would have to use information gathered by the Israelis and Palestinians.

Judge declares news service violated rights

By Cassandra Burrell
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — United Press International violated the District of Columbia's human rights law when it fired a reporter after learning she is a lesbian, a federal judge ruled yesterday.

Judge Joyce Hens Green granted Julie Brienza, 33, a default judgment against UPI after the news service's attorneys failed to appear in court to defend the company against her lawsuit. Green ordered the company to expunge Brienza's personnel records of references to the termination and replace them with this statement: "Ms. Julie Brienza left her employment with United Press International Inc. on April 28, 1990, for reasons best known by Ms. Brienza and United Press International Inc., but not for cause."

At the time of Brienza's dismissal, UPI said she violated company rules about writing for other publications.

Brienza's suit claimed UPI bowed to pressure from a religious broadcaster who urged listeners nationwide to flood UPI with telephone calls complaining about her. Earlier

Lecture explores fallacies about Dead Sea Scrolls

By Amy Paradysz
Collegian Staff

Common misconceptions about the Dead Sea scrolls were dissected Wednesday night in a speech by Dr. Lawrence Shiffman, a member of the international scrolls editing team.

"You can't get people to stop the insane desire to use those scrolls either as proof of Christianity or to disprove Christ," said Shiffman, author of Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls.

The documents are not proto–Christian, according to Shiffman, who tried to prove the teachings of Jesus Christ and the ideals of the Qumran sect at opposite ends of the spectrum. For example, the authors of the Dead Sea scrolls said that if your animal falls in a ditch on the Sabbath, you don't lift a finger to save him. The traditional Jewish teaching allowed indirect assistance. Christ said to pull the animal out.

These theological differences are irrelevant to Shiffman who believes the scrolls were written before Christ was born.

Shiffman said the scrolls were written by a dissenting sect of Sadducees who retreated to Qumran, near the Dead Sea, after the Maccabean revolt in 167 B.C.E. They were written after the Torah, but before the birth of Christ. Shiffman's said his conclusion is based upon references to dates in the texts, the archaeology of the site and caves, and carbon–14 dating.

These people physically separated themselves from the Sadducees because they wanted to be more pure than the law required but, according to Shiffman, they were Jews and practiced Jewish traditions.

The debate began in 1947 when a peasant discovered ancient jars in a cave, now called Cave One. The jars contained seven scrolls wrapped in cloth. Since then, most interest in the Dead Sea scrolls has centered on these few scrolls and their authorship, said Shiffman.

But 550 other manuscripts were found in a series of caves soon after the first discovery. According to Shiffman, a Bethlehem cobbler was selling scrolls to an archaeological museum in Jordan.

Christianization of the Scrolls

In 1954, seven years after the discovery in Cave One, an "interfaith" group, consisting entirely of Catholics and Protestants, was assembled to edit the scrolls. Thus began the "Christianization" of the manuscripts, said Shiffman.

That first group of scholars considered the ancient settlement to be something like a monastery, because 1,100 dishes were found in one strata, and communal meals are characteristic of monastic life, Shiffman said.

However, over 1,000 graves were found — with their heads all facing Jerusalem — and 30 percent of the dead were women or children. So the Qumran sect was not celibate, said Shiffman. In fact, one scroll included a law instructing men over the age of 20 to get married and have sexual relations.

As a Jew himself, Shiffman said he believes the significance of the scrolls is that they tell how early Jews treated the Torah with sanctity and used it to study.

"Their Book of Leviticus is virtually identical to ours," said Shiffman.

The Qumran sect copied unaltered versions of scripture, much like today's Bible, but they also wrote "updated" study versions,

Undergraduate research shown in Campus Center

By Purva Panday
Collegian Correspondent

The first "Conference on Undergraduate Research, Scholarly and Public Service Activities" will be held in the Campus Center Auditorium Monday to highlight research work at the University of Massachusetts system.

More than 120 undergraduate scholars from the four undergraduate UMass campuses will participate in the conference where they will give presentations on their research from different academic disciplines and areas of public service.

Participants will also have the opportunity to take part in a series of seminars throughout the afternoon which will be run by representatives from the Mather Career Center, the International Programs Office and the Graduate School.

Seminars will focus on pertinent issues, such as applying to graduate schools, seeking internship opportunities, writing a senior thesis, and creating a resume.

The event is made possible by a grant from the UMass President's Office and is co-sponsored by the Honors Programs at the Amherst, Boston, Dartmouth and Lowell campuses.

"This conference demonstrates the cooperation and unity which exists between the four participating campuses and exemplifies the strong support of the administration to undergraduate education," said Linda Nolan, UMass–Amherst honors director.

Participants will compete for prizes in numerous categories. Certificates and $2,000 in cash awards will be distributed to top presenters.

this month, the broadcaster — the Rev. Vic Eliason — agreed to pay Brienza $255,000.

"This is a great vindication of Brienza's rights," said Suzanne Goldberg, a staff attorney for the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, a gay rights group that helped her with the case. "What's important is that the court showed a willingness to hold a large corporation accountable for sexual orientation discrimination," Goldberg said.

UPI declined comment, saying the controversy occurred before its ownership changed hands in June 1992.

"I haven't heard anything about it," UPI spokeswoman Annette Chapin said. "That was under the old company."

Brienza's attorney, Lynne Bernabei, said UPI attorneys didn't show up for any court hearings and filed no pretrial statement.

College students support HS counterparts

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

A group of concerned minority college students met with their Amherst High School counterparts last week to break ground on a new motivational program.

Approximately 20 Black, Latino, and Asian high schoolers made time after school to welcome the University of Massachusetts and Hampshire College representatives to their cafeteria, where pizza and refreshments were served.

Vitally Involved in Volunteer Action (VIVA), a student– run group based on the UMass campus, was responsible for the afternoon, as well as the project that united members of the two colleges' minority communities.

UMass senior Anne Lima, coordinator of VIVA, said she hopes the other three institutions in the five college system will soon also be involved in tutoring and other activities now in the developmental stages.

"This is the first step," Lima said.

Following the snack time, a discussion revolving around the reflections of past and present secondary students.

Amherst High sophomore and class president Chris Rue remarked on the value of the college students' presence in the school.

"We can look over our shoulders and say, 'There's a Black face,'" Rue said. "Older Blacks have gone through the struggle and they made it.

"We have moral support in just the Blackness of your being here."

Rue added that many minority students are placed in "basic" classes rather than those designated "advanced" or "standard."

The problem with the basic courses is that a GPA of 3.0 (versus a 4.0 in other courses) is the highest average that can be attained because the courses are considered to be of lesser difficulty.

Thus, even if students were to have perfect grades throughout their secondary education, colleges would still be likely to frown upon the transcripts.

In addition, Rue was concerned with standardized test preparations.

"It makes us Black students want to work harder not to be that statistic," Rue said.

The alienation suffered by many in a predominantly White environment was also an issue voiced by several at the meeting.

Lima herself drew from her experiences in dealing with what she termed the "duality" of some White teachers.

Citing individuals who would only encourage minority success to a certain extent before giving them so–called "realistic" goals, Lima revealed to the younger students the basic reason behind the VIVA mission.

"I don't want you to grow up in the same situation we did," Lima said.

Others from both colleges concurred with Lima on the issue of improving present educational conditions.

"We're just trying to do the best for our own," said Hampshire student Sekou Frye, himself an Amherst High graduate. "We know it can be hard going through school so we wanted to make it easier for the next ones coming up."

Senior Eric Temus, a former football player for the Minutemen, offered insight into one his motives for helping the cause.

"They need us athletes," Temus said, referring to the high number of minority student–athletes at the high school. "It shows them that even the athletes are not just athletes."

At the close of the meeting, Lima seemed pleased.

Final plans being made for space allocation

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center/Student Union (CC/SU) Commission met last night, less than two days before they plan to discuss and review the 76 space allocation applications and renewal forms submitted by Registered Student Organizations (RSO), Graduate Student Organizations (GSO), and agencies.

Rooms in the Campus Center have been reserved from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, according to Matthew Auger, commission chair. The organizations who filed for office space totals less than half of the approximate 180 mailboxes representing University of Massachusetts organizations.

"It is going to be an interesting process," Auger said. "How can we do it in an equitable way and maximize time?"

The deadline for submission, widely–publicized for the past two weeks, has come and gone, and those RSOs, GSOs, and agencies who neglected to file will have to deal with the consequences, according to Dagmar Ginieser, graduate student member of the commission.

Colin Cavell, also a graduate student member of the commission, pointed out the "randomness" and "arbitrariness" of the process.

"All these are subjective questions," he said. "Political decisions we cannot avoid."

Esther Salas, commission vending officer, suggested the commission approach the process using three stages. First, review applications and renewal forms, then debate points for each answer, and finish by assigning office space.

In the event an organization happens to be displeased with their assignment which is expected in early May, the commission also left open an avenue of appeal.

"If we make the decision and they don't like it, they can appeal," Cavell said.

In related commission business, they voted to display a mural donated by AHORA, the Spanish–speaking RSO, in an undetermined location in the CC/SU Complex.

Also, a new member attended the meeting last night. Julio Cordero will be appointed by the Student Government Association in time for next week's meeting, he said.

■ Differing theories on Scrolls examined

according to Shiffman.

Other theories

Although Shiffman's main emphasis was to prove that the authors of the scrolls were not early Christians, he mentioned the following theories he considers false:

- The scrolls have nothing to do with the sect and could originally have been from the library of the Second Temple in Jerusalem.
- "The cave, the site and the scrolls are all to be linked," said Shiffman, who cited archaeological evidence, such as pottery. Qumran had a distinct pottery style, and only one example of the style has been found outside the settlement, said Shiffman. He also said that not all the scrolls had to be written at Qumran. Some could have been collected.
- Most of what is known about Judaism was made up after the destruction of the Temple.

Shiffman said this obviously is not true because since the Qumran people used the same texts as modern Jews.

- There has been "Vatican control" of the scrolls.

The first group of editors was composed of four Catholics and four Protestants, said Shiffman. But then one Protestant withdrew, one converted to Catholicism and one became an agnostic. Although one of the Catholics died, the "interfaith" group was predominantly Catholic. However, the Vatican had nothing to do with the scrolls, said Shiffman, adding that the current group of scholars studying the scrolls includes Jews.

- Qumran was a Roman fortress.

Although Shiffman conceded that some archeological remains at Qumran suggest that the site was originally a Roman fortress, he insisted it was not a Roman fortress at the time the scrolls were written. Shiffman said the Qumran sect had a water supply that could have easily been cut off by their enemies. If attacked, they would have to run through the cemetery and jump into the sea, he said.

WOMEN making WAVES

Advances made in cancer treatment

Breast cancer therapies that go beyond or replace traditional mastectomy have proven their worth in long–term studies, new reports say. The days when most women were offered only removal of their cancerous breasts are long gone.

The latest reports in the New England Journal of Medicine help lift any lingering doubts about two now–common treatments: combining mastectomy with drugs in advanced breast cancer and replacing mastectomy with tumor removal and radiation in less advanced cases.

Findings indicate that 25 percent of women who had mastectomies alone and 34 percent who had mastectomies plus follow–up drug treatment were alive 20 years after diagnosis of breast cancer that had spread to the lymph nodes.

In addition, at least 75 percent of early breast cancer patients survived 10 years, whether they had mastectomies or had lumpectomies (removal of the cancerous lump) plus follow–up treatment with radiation.

Pro Bono work honored

Sarah McLean received the Pro Bono Award from the Massachusetts Bar Association Access to Justice last month. The award honors an individual who has performed significant case work for an established pro bono program or who has developed a pro bono program.

Sarah McLean has dedicated a large percentage of her solo private practice to pro bono activities. As vice–president and pro bono committee chairperson of the Women's Bar Association, McLean has developed a pilot project to provide representation to low–income battered women in Middlesex County Probate and Family Court. The project trains attorneys and recruits mentors to assist women in the areas of domestic violence, family and criminal law.

A lawyer's reflections...

Also in the legal community, Assistant U.S. Attorney Annette Forde is a Boston bar member on the move. Forde, who holds seats on both the Boston Bar Association Council and the Boston Bar Journal Board of Editors, reflects on her first 14 years as a lawyer. The self–described "aimost career government lawyer" said she has no doubts about the choices she has made.

"Working in the U.S. Attorney's Office is the best job any lawyer could have," said Forde. "There's a great sense of satisfaction in knowing that we represent the interests of all of the people."

Forde, who said she believes Boston is a less "comfortable" place because the number of minority lawyers practicing is relatively small, is now in the process of developing a Boston Bar Journal that focuses on diversity in the law.

"When most people think of diversity, they tend to think of different races," said Forde. "We want to give a voice to lawyers of diverse ethnic and racial backgrounds, but also to governmental lawyers, lawyers in small firms and solo practice and to lawyers who practice in areas of that have an impact on the lives of women, children and minorities."

Pleasures of off–campus life

It's hunting season again. House hunting, that is.

The area landlords and rent collectors were in the Campus Center this week trying to get YOU, disenchanted dorm dweller, to consider the luxuries of paying rent and having a bathroom that you can actually control the cleanliness of.

Not one of the landlords I talked to this week said a bad thing about the apartments they were renting. Not only is this good business sense (they wouldn't be too smart if they said "Well, our apartments pretty much suck but you're only a three mile walk from the bus stop"), but it's also deceptive.

Dave Copeland

Try as you might, you will never find a perfect off– campus living arrangement. Every place will have its disadvantages. And you will never know how crappy or good a place is until you live there.

I'm not going to mention any specific apartment complexes, but let's just say that I have spent the last four semesters living at a point in South Amherst. Although I have three charming roommates (as previously seen in this space), off–campus life has been less than pleasant because of my slum, I mean land, lords.

Maintenance, and the lack of it, has been one of our biggest problems, primarily because the alleged maintenance men at our apartment complex find the concept of maintenance foreign.

The first day we moved in we had a slight electrical problem (nothing major — just the fact that the entire circuit board was rusty and water logged). After replacing the old circuit board with a "new" one that was just as rusty, but not quite as wet, the leader of the maintenance men proudly told me how he single–handedly rebuilt our entire apartment the summer before we moved in.

But when another problem arose (this time it was water coming through the kitchen light socket every time someone took a shower), the same, bewildered maintenance man returned and angrily asked "Who the [expletive] did the maintenance on this?"

Let's see. I think you did, [expletive] head.

Our grandest/worst maintenance problem occurred last summer when the ceiling in my bedroom abruptly caved in, exposing the room to the great outdoors. Fortunately, no one was hurt, but all of the neighborhood wildlife did have free reign in my sock drawer for a few weeks.

The rental offices consolation attempt was to say "Oh yes, you're the third apartment that that's happened to this week." When Bambi is running through your apartment because of an unwanted skylight in your bedroom, it's little reassurance to know that your neighbors are fighting off Tigger and Rocky Raccoon.

Now, nearly a year later, the ceiling is not completely fixed, but the animals were kept at bay with a giant piece of plywood, which was recently replaced with an unfinished ceiling repair job.

There are added "perks" to our apartment. The fact that we live a three day journey from any form of civilization is probably something we should have considered when we were looking at apartments, but it would be nice to be able to get to the store for coffee and a newspaper without packing an overnight bag.

And last spring we learned that we live eternally down wind from a farm. This provides us with the farm fresh air that makes you want to vomit. [Note: Mr. Copeland is not implying that farming is a menial trade, nor is he stating that farmers should be more considerate to his nostrils. He is merely stating that the manure used in farming doesn't smell good.]

There are other tricks landlords will use. Monday, May 29 is the local "Raise The Rent Day," because that is the day that the landlords know you will be long gone for your summer vacation. By the time you are informed of this raise it will be too late to find a new, more nostril friendly apartment.

My point is, be careful before you make the leap to off– campus living. The dorms aren't perfect, but at least you don't have to worry about being electrocuted because the maintenance men can't figure out how to separate your plumbing from your electrical wires.

Ask questions, avoid electric heat and read your lease. But most of all, watch for falling ceilings.

Losing the battle of the bands

Dinosaur Jr. and Sonic Youth at Amherst College, Harry Connick Jr. at Smith, Toad the Wet Sprocket at Mount Holyoke, and now appearing at UMass ... Method Man? Oh, I forgot. He didn't bother to show up.

In the Five College battle to land top–notch musical acts, UMass is a distant fourth (I haven't heard of anyone coming to Hampshire just yet). How is it that the university with the best facilities and the most students is losing out in the race to land these bands?

Caleb Cochran

I understand University Productions and Concerts (UPC) doesn't have a lot of money to spend on bands, but the days of bringing up and coming acts like the young Pearl Jam (in 1992) to the Student Union Ballroom are apparently long gone. In fact, many students now associate UPC only with the Spring Concert, which is too bad, considering the big show has been relatively disappointing since (once again) 1992, when the Beastie Boys, Fishbone, Phish, and the Mighty Mighty Bosstones graced the stage.

Perhaps there are good reasons why Toad, Connick, Dino Jr. and other acts are spurning UMass in favor of the smaller venues in the area. Maybe they want to play in more intimate settings, for smaller crowds. I can't understand how this could be the case, though, considering the University offers small locations as well, such as the Student Union Ballroom and Bowker Auditorium (the site of U2's only visit to Amherst in 1982). Thus, there must be other reasons why UMass hasn't landed live shows of high caliber as of late.

Almost certainly, one of the problems is the limited budget of UPC. While I sympathize with this problem, I think that some of the financial problems could be solved if UPC concentrated on bringing one or two big draws to campus during the year and saving up to bring another two or three to Spring Concert. Rage Against the Machine, who appeared at the Student Union Ballroom in 1993, represents the type of band that we should be seeing more of — bands that have a big enough name to draw a big crowd, but that are still too small to command huge bucks.

To be fair, things were not always like this. Once upon a time, there were some pretty good shows on campus. The aforementioned Pearl Jam show was certainly a good call, as was Rage in the fall of '93. Sometime in the last year or so, things began to take a turn for the worse. The William D. Mullins Center has attracted several big–name acts (at big– time prices, no doubt), such as Lenny Kravitz, Elton John and, more recently, Melissa Etheridge and Live. It's out of the question for UPC to bring these acts here, and it's nice to have the Mullins Center around for those times when you feel like going to an impersonal arena show.

However, these shows are often overpriced and completely lacking in atmosphere (read: fun). I paid $17 to see Live last month, and it's safe to say that I won't be going back to the Mullins Center anytime soon. The band played well, but I walked out of the arena with nary of a reminder of my experience. After the recent Mighty Mighty Bosstones show at Pearl Street, in contrast, I was deaf in my right ear for a day and a half and I was a sweaty, bruised, exhausted mess when I left the club. That's exactly how I like to feel after a concert. If I wanted to sit comfortably and listen to a band play, I'd sit at home and listen to the CD. In short, the Mullins Center should not be the only source for quality live music at the University. It's just too big to be any fun.

The Student Union Ballroom is an underutilized facility and a great place for a concert. It's too bad that recently the only acts to grace the stage have been the likes of Method Man's replacement, Dirty Old Bastard. Oh, I forgot. He didn't show up either.

I'd love to have UPC shut me up really fast by bringing someone of merit to this year's Spring Concert. If the Blues Traveler rumor holds up, that would be a good start. However, until UPC brings some fresh talent to UMass from September through April, as well as on Mother's Day, the glory days of the Student Union Ballroom will continue to be nothing but a distant memory.

Theories on the resurrection

It's Easter weekend everybody! Do you know what that means? It means that about 1,962 years ago some guy named Jesus Christ rose from the dead. Rose from the dead? That's a cool trick, how did he do that? It's simple.

All you have to do is lay low for awhile, follow the 10 Commandments, be a carpenter for 30 years, then go around claiming to be the Son of God and say enough crazy things to get you the cross (or in '90s terms, the chair). It's that simple. No actually, Jesus was able to do the coolest trick of all time because he is the Son of God.

David K. Chan

So what do you think of Jesus? Well here are three options you can choose from:

1. I don't believe in any of that stuff; 2. Jesus was a cool philosopher and he taught some good things but I don't think he's God; and 3. I believe in all of that stuff.

This may sound ironic but I'd rather have people choose the first option instead of the second. Why, Dave? Why would you rather have someone not believe in Jesus than think that he was just a good philosopher and teacher? Well let me tell you why.

There are really only two options that we have to think of Jesus, not three. The two are: 1. I think Jesus was a crazy lunatic who was in vast need of help; and 2. I think Jesus is the Lord, the Son of God, the conqueror of Satan, the MacDaddy, etc. These are two extreme standpoints and you have to take one of the two because Jesus himself was extreme.

Wait a minute, how was Jesus extreme? Well, he was like Vanilla Ice, "to the extreme." No, I'm just kidding; that was a bad joke. What I mean is that there are three things about Jesus that set him apart from any other man in history.

The first is that he was born from a virgin. Now I don't know about you, but no ordinary good philosopher and teacher can be born from a virgin. Nature doesn't work that way. So what does being born from a virgin mean? It means that Jesus claimed to have been above nature, which us ordinary men/women are bound to. So he was either crazy enough to think that his mother was a virgin or he was really the Son of God.

The second extreme case is that Jesus went around telling people that he forgave them of their sins. Imagine this, you and your friend are at this kickin' party in Brandywine or something, and in the midst of all the hoopla, you decide to steal a bunch of CDs from the party.

As you and your friend casually walk out of the apartment with the CDs, a couple of guys come running after you and they beat the lights out of both of you with an empty keg. As you lie on the wet grass in pain, some guy out of nowhere comes up to you and says, "I forgive you." That's crazy. Too bad the owners of the CDs didn't say that to you, but that's what Jesus does. He forgives us. It's an extreme thing to say. It either makes him the perfect man or the biggest hypocrite of all time.

And third, Jesus rose from the dead. He claimed to have conquered Satan, or in other words, death. No ordinary human being rises from the dead, just ask your biology professor. So by claiming to have conquered death, what does that make Jesus? It makes him either a psychiatrist's dream or you guessed it, the Lord.

So this Easter weekend think about these three crazy things. I'm not trying to be a preacher or anything, I'm just giving a mere statement of belief. It's something we should all do.

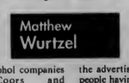
Lower drinking age to 18

As I sat in front of the television with a few friends enjoying a Killian's Irish Red, a commercial interrupted the Minuteman's dismantling of Tulsa during the NCAA tournament a few weeks ago. The commercial was from Coors, and it insisted individuals who are underage abstain from drinking until they are 21 years old because Coors can wait for their business. We laughed because everyone in the room except me was underage, and we were drinking a product that Coors markets.



Matthew Wurtzel

The truth is alcohol companies such as Coors and Anheuser–Busch rely upon underage drinkers because without them their profits would plummet. According to statistics in the Oct. 23, 1994 Boston Globe Magazine there are 11 million heavy drinking Americans, and about a third of them are under 25 years old. The definition of a heavy drinker is an individual who consumes more than five drinks in the past five days. Because many college students drink more than five drinks on one Friday night alone, the implication is most college students are heavy drinkers.

The evidence can easily be observed around Amherst. Many of the off–campus housing complexes are well known for their large keg parties where underage drinking is rampant. People who are of age pack the uptown bars like herds being rounded up into cattle cars. The Alcohol Beverage Commission (ABC) came to Amherst to crack down on fake IDs this past weekend.

The Globe article said the alcohol industry has an annual media and promotion budget of about $2 billion. Many of the advertisements display young people having fun, and very few of the advertisements are like the Coors commercial asking people not to drink before they are 21 years old. Some advertisements even display prominent musicians, actors and models. The advertisements are designed to appeal to people who are 18 to 24 years old, college students.

The government is wasting time and money which could be better spent on other programs. The drinking age should be lowered to 18 years old. The attraction to underage drinking is the rebellious idea of independence. Many of my friends and I did not start drinking until we came to college last year. When I came to the University of Massachusetts I was 19, and many of my friends were 18 when they came to the University.

Not only could the state save money by not having to enforce a drinking age of 21 years old, but they could possibly obtain more tax revenue through sales to a larger population. Police departments across the state would make fewer arrests for underage possession of alcohol, and court time could be freed up from such frivolous charges.

Temperance groups such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD) oppose such ideas as lowering the drinking age in fear of greater problems with drunk driving. However, most underage drinkers are college students who either do not have cars or go to bars or parties which are within walking distance of campus.

As long as the drinking age is 21 years old, college students will still drink while they are underage. Besides, if someone is mature enough to choose the leaders of the nation, they should be considered mature enough to drink a beer.

Letters to the Editor

News analysis too editorial

To the editor:

In his article, Syed Mohammed Ali Raza made a reference to Israeli assassination squads. This accusation is so preposterous that, throughout the whole history of Israel, there has never been one reputable politician or historian comfortable enough to suggest such an unfounded statement. Also, the fact that Raza blames Israel for taking security measures such as identity cards, military courts and military presence on the borders shows the writer's lack of knowledge in regard to the Arab/Israeli conflict. History has proven that these precautions have been vital elements in ensuring the safety of Israeli citizens. Any kind of leeway extended towards the Palestinians has resulted in atrocities such as suicide bombings and merciless murders of innocent civilians.

And why does the Collegian feel compelled to constantly print such blatantly opinionated views on its front page?

Prof discusses queer photos

Lecture, slide show document impact of homoerotic images

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

Beginning with the Robert Mapplethorpe controversy in 1989, the world of photography has been the focus of a large scale debate between artists, politicians, and academics. Photographs that include homoerotic images or challenge sexual and gender normativity have been seen as both revolutionary and pornographic.

Calling the artists who create such works "reporters on the front" of a "culture war," Professor Deborah Bright of the Rhode Island School of Design presented a lecture and slide show this past Wednesday which detailed their work and impact on the world.

"New Queer Photography" was part of the Lesbian, Gay, and Bisexual Studies Lecture Series sponsored by the Program for GLB Concerns.

Mapplethorpe controversy

Mapplethorpe rose to fame in the late 1970s and early 1980s as a photographer who specialized in flowers and celebrities. It was not until 1989 that a posthumous exhibit of his works presented his previously unreleased homoerotic photographs and made him the center of artistic and political controversy.

The exhibit received partial funding from the federally sponsored National Endowment for the Arts. Some photographs included images of sado–masochism, masturbation, homoerotism and other acts that some citizen groups and members of Congress found morally offensive and "pornographic."

A backlash ensued during which artists found themselves increasingly at odds with conservatives who wanted to either control the content of federally funded art or eliminate federal arts funding altogether, Bright said.

Rise of "self–censorship"

Afraid to risk the loss of precious federal funding or their chances to survive in the art world, many photographers are engaged in what Bright called "self–censorship."

"Playing it safe is the order of the day," Bright said.

Over the past few years, as a professor of photography and art history, Bright has seen young photographers grow more and more reluctant to deal with controversial themes. These themes include the kind of "queer" images that brought Mapplethorpe to the fore.

There are still several photographers pursuing these images, however, said Bright, the editor of the latest issue of Exposure, subtitled "Sex Wars: Photography on the Front Lines." Exposure is the journal of the Society for Photography Education, a nationwide group of photography teachers and academics.

Bright said that when she was asked to edit the journal, she decided to "put sexuality and gender on the agenda." Far too little attention has been given to queer photography, she said.

Queer photography today

Photogrsphs from Exposure formed the basis of a 45 minute slide show to present the wide range of works that make up queer photography today. All the works are distinctly different from one another, Bright said, but all are "queer." This is not because of the sexual orientation of their creators, she said, but because they all challenge sexual and gender normativity. Some of the works were produced by heterosexual men, some by lesbians, others by gay men.

Queer photography includes everything from images of gay sex to depictions of the lesbian biker scene. Some photographs mock famous works from the past, while others employ new techniques involving computer manipulation, superimposition, and collage.

"This is what's out there," Bright said.

However, Bright concluded, most of it will never be funded or exhibited in mainstream venues.

FNM release uncompromising effort

KING FOR A DAY, FOOL FOR A LIFETIME
Faith No More
Slash/Reprise

Faith No More has always been hard to pin down. When 1989's The Real Thing came out, no one knew what to make of it. It was metal, it was somewhat funky, and then there was Mike Patton's white boy rapping. Whatever it was, it caught on and became a precursor to the now generic term "alternative" and the currently insipid genre of funk– metal.

Its subsequent album, Angel Dust, tested audiences once more with a darker, thought–provoking edge which stumped even the most loyal of fans. And while the album failed to obtain the same status as The Real Thing, it easily silenced critical generalizations towards the band.

Now, on its latest release, King for a Day, Fool for a Lifetime, Faith No More continues to question its popularity, as well as musical agenda, with its most uncompromising album to date. No longer are there attempts to make genre correlations; their diverse musical tastes are taken head on. Influences are evident on each song, yet why or how they relate to each other as a whole album is another question.

Their augmented eclecticism is, in part, attributed to the band's new (and already ex–) guitarist, Trey Spruance, Patton's cohort in the extremely unconventional Mr. Bungle. Where original guitarist, Jim Martin, was more inclined towards metal, Spruance feeds himself on a more diverse diet, which invariably helps the band to achieve the best of all musical extremes.

From the 70s R&B of "Evidence" to the sheer metal of "The Gentle Art of Making Enemies" to the country–ish "Take this Bottle," the absurd irrelevance never lets up.

The numerous alter–egos of Patton doesn't facilitate the listening experience, either. When he takes on the role of Las Vegas superstar ("Star A.D.") or Latino lover ("Caralho Voador"), it's done with such sincerity and conviction that one can only wonder whether to take it seriously. This is especially true when such songs are juxtaposed with art– thrash experiments like "Cuckoo for Caca," in which Patton displays his patented rap style intertwined with high–pitched squalls, a la the Boredoms.

Faith No More is obviously operating light years ahead of its time and taking its status as unseriously as possible.

Whether King for a Day, Fool for a Lifetime will reach the masses is questionable, but even if a major breakthrough were to arise, Faith No More seems ready for it, as evident in Patton's overly optimistic lyric, "What a day — when you can look it in the face and hold your vomit."

No matter what the commercial fate of this album will be, Faith No More has proven that it is continually willing to take chances and revel in the unexpected. A

Building an homage to animation

By Bob Thomas
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — For months last year, commuters gazed in wonderment at a strange–looking structure rising in the San Fernando Valley adjacent to the Ventura Freeway. What was it? A dirigible hangar? A shed for testing rocket motors? A mammoth bowling alley?

The building took shape, with its square windows looking out on the freeway, a wide strip of metal stretching across the top (its occupants call it the Mohawk), and a four–story dunce's cap in the front.

Finally, in late 1994 came the tip–off. Huge letters emblazoned across the side proclaimed: ANIMATION.

Situated across Riverside Drive from the Walt Disney Studio, this is the new Animation Building, which opened rather quietly earlier this year and cost about $50 million. The vertical–striped "Mohawk" top is supposed to symbolize a strip of film. The cone in front, now painted pale blue with stars and a crescent moon, represents the Sorcerer's hat that Mickey Mouse borrowed in Fantasia.

The building is replete with symbolism. The rooftop facing the main studio features a series of low domes, the same shape as the top of movie stages. Inside and out, the design by Robert A.M. Stern reflects the streamline, luxury–liner, modern style of the 1930s, the period when Disney began to flourish.

"Our company is a company of whimsy and fun," says Disney chairman Michael Eisner in his office stop the Team Disney Building which houses the company bigshots.

"This building [Team Disney] is a serious, important building. ... But instead of having it look like a bank, we have our dwarfs on the front, metaphorically holding up the roof, which Snow White did in its day, not metaphorically but specifically.

"If you have to build buildings for your business, you might as well build good buildings, with people who have talent. ... They just have to be made with bricks and mortar and stand for closer to eternity than a film."

Eisner reported that the company has created 55 buildings, not including those in theme parks, during the 10 years of the current regime. The designers include some of the biggest names in architecture, and Eisner oversees every phase.

The new Animation Building helps soothe a decade of bad feelings by the makers of the animated films.

Smith to declare eligibility

COLLEGE PARK, Md. (AP) — Maryland All-American Joe Smith will announce at a news conference today that he is making himself available for the NBA draft, a team source said.

The source, confirming earlier reports in the Washington Post and the Diamondback, the student paper at the University of Maryland, told the Associated Press that the 19-year-old center would declare his eligibility.

His mother, Letha Smith, told the Diamondback that her son would hold the news conference Friday in Norfolk, Va., his hometown. Smith, who attended the team's awards banquet Wednesday night, would not comment.

The 6-foot-10 sophomore center averaged 20.8 points, 10.4 rebounds and 2.9 blocked shots while helping Maryland to a 26-8 record. He was voted Player of the Year by the AP, and received the Naismith College Basketball Player of the Year award.

Smith also received the most votes in the All-America balloting. "He's in a no-lose situation," said Terrapins head coach Gary Williams. "He either returns to a team with four other starters, or he goes to the NBA and makes a lot of money. It's a good situation to be in."

Williams said he has talked to Smith frequently during the past several weeks and that Smith has carefully considered all of his options.

"I think he's done a good job of looking at every side of the issue," Williams said. "My role is to answer any questions he may have and make sure that he looks at everything on every side." If Smith turns pro, Maryland still will have a strong program, Williams said.

"You'll miss a player like Joe," Williams said. "But if he goes, you won't fold up your tent and go home."

Smith has until May 15 to declare himself eligible for the draft. If he goes pro, he likely would be among the first five players chosen, depending on which team is selecting first and which other non-seniors leave school.

Cowboys' Williams arrested

DALLAS (AP) — Erik Williams, a Pro Bowl offensive tackle for the Dallas Cowboys, was arrested today after a 17-year-old girl accused him of sexually assaulting her, police said.

Dallas Police Sgt. Jim Chandler said Williams was taken into custody after police responded to a telephoned request for help by the girl.

Chandler said officers went to Williams' home in north Dallas and asked for the girl by her first name. Williams told officers that the girl was not there and that there was no disturbance. As officers returned to their patrol car, they said they heard a sound and saw the girl looking out of a window. Officers then arrested Williams and another man, who was not immediately identified.

"She told them the story that she had been forced, with verbal threats, to engage in sexual intercourse with both men," Chandler said.

Williams was seriously injured Oct. 24 when his car slammed into a ramp on Interstate 635. Major reconstructive surgery was performed on his right knee, and he missed the rest of the season. The accident followed an evening of celebrating with teammates after the Cowboys' victory over the Arizona Cardinals.

He pleaded no contest to misdemeanor drunken driving, and received two years probation.

Williams, 26, was a Pro Bowl player in 1993. The 6-6, 324-pound lineman played college football at Central State of Ohio.

More legal trouble for Eagleson

TORONTO (AP) — Evidence from a civil suit might incriminate Alan Eagleson in pending U.S. criminal proceedings and a Canadian law society complaint, the lawyer for the former head of the NHL players union says.

J. Edgar Sexton argued Wednesday before Justice Susan Lang that a suit brought against Eagleson by former Boston Bruins player Mike Gillis should be stayed since examinations for discovery could aid U.S. justice officials and Law Society of Upper Canada prosecutors at Eagleson's expense.

Gillis alleges Eagleson, who represented him as an agent, improperly billed him to receive disability insurance money after the player broke his leg in 1984. Eagleson has been indicted by a Massachusetts grand jury on racketeering, fraud and embezzlement charges in relation to his representation of Boston players.

The law society says Eagleson, who headed the players union from 1975 to 1993, improperly billed players while representing them, misled a client and misused $94,000 worth of airline tickets issued in exchange for advertising at Canada Cup tournaments.

Sexton suggested evidence from Gillis' case "will seep into the criminal arena" and prejudice Eagleson's chance to defend himself properly. Sexton wants the suit delayed until a 32-count grand jury indictment and a 45-allegation law society complaint are dealt with.

"Boiling it all down, should Mr. Eagleson, as a Canadian citizen, be forced by Canadian courts to assist U.S. prosecutors when the same Canadian courts would not compel him to assist a Canadian prosecutor?" Sexton said.

Gillis's lawyer, Charles Scott, said that "we're not here as agents for some foreign power" and argued "there are sufficient safeguards under Canadian law" to protect Eagleson's interests as a defendant.

Bruiser Flint named associate coach

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Promotions continue in the Massachusetts basketball coaching staff following the naming of former associate coach Bill Bayno to the head coaching position at the University of Nevada-Las Vegas.

Assistant Coach James "Bruiser" Flint was elevated to the associate coach position after spending six years as an assistant.

Calipari praised Flint's coaching talents when he made the announcement.

"This is the natural move for us, and having Bruiser as the associate coach only further solidifies our staff," Calipari said Wednesday. "Bruiser has done an exceptional job in both recruiting and coaching for us and I expect that to continue."

Flint, a Philadelphia native, graduated from St. Joseph's in 1987. He is fourth on the Hawks all-time assists list, and he led the Atlantic 10 conference in that category his senior season.

James "Bruiser" Flint

Flint joined the UMass staff in 1989, after spending two seasons at Coppin State in Maryland, where he was an assistant coach and athletic director.

Flint's promotion comes just one day after UMass announced that former restricted-earnings coach John Robic had been elevated to full-time assistant.

The University is currently looking to fill the vacancy at the restricted earnings coach position.

Recruiting notes: Massachusetts, as well as many other schools in the nation, received no letters of intent as the first day of the signing period passed uneventfully. However no player interested in UMass as a final choice committed anywhere else either ... Jameel Watkins, who came to UMass on an official recruiting visit last weekend is expected to make his decision on April 24 according to Paul Robeson, a representative of his high school in Brooklyn, N.Y. The 6-foot-9-inch power forward is also being recruited by Cincinnati and West Virginia.

with Seattle in 1990.

If veterans such as Mo Vaughn, Mike Greenwell and John Valentin can play up to their ability, new acquisitions Luis Alicea, Reggie Jefferson and Mike Macfarlane can step up and earn their money, and if Ken Ryan can come in and close the door, then the Sox look good.

• Corliss Williamson of the Arkansas Razorbacks basketball team clearly is not a man of his word. In fact, he has stuck his basketball shoe in his mouth once again.

Before the UMass Minutemen were to face the Razorbacks in the Hall of Fame Tip-off classic, Williamson said the second team of Arkansas could beat UMass' first team. Gulp, final score UMass 104, Arkansas 80.

After Williamson and Co. lost to the UCLA Bruins in the finals of the NCAA tournament not too long ago, he said he would return to Arkansas for his senior year. One week later, Williamson announced he was going pro and that his emotions were talking when he said he would stay at Arkansas. Looks like the money is doing the talking now.

• Congratulations to Andre Agassi who finally has climbed to the top of the tennis world dethroning Pete Sampras. It appears as if Agassi traded in his hair for a game. If image is everything, then why go bald? Then again, if you have Brooke Shields, image isn't even the word.

• Michael Jordan is back dominating the National Basketball Association. He will probably play another 10 years or so, win more Championship rings than he has fingers, and retire to play in the Senior's Golf Tour. The Chicago Bulls will be forced to retire No. 45 along with No. 23. Too bad they don't have numbers in golf.

• It is bad enough that Marcus Camby, Joe Smith, Jerry Stackhouse, and Rasheed Wallace might be leaving college after their sophomore years to play in the NBA. At Magic's roundball tournament featuring the country's best high school basketball players, there was talk about 6-foot-10 inch Kevin Garnett who has Shawn Kemp ability going straight to the NBA, bypassing college. Hey NBA scouts, I heard there is an eighth grader from Springfield who can shoot the rock.

Freshman Karen Pelkey will lead the Lady Knights offensively. Pelkey has a team-high .367 batting average and and a team-high 33 hits. She will also be a threat to steal on the bases. In 26 games started, Pelkey has successfully stolen 23 bases in 24 attempts.

Cheryl Gnoinski should be a threat at the plate as well, she is currently second on the team in batting average (.363) and hits (29). She is also second on the team in RBIs with 20. Sharon Morris leads the team in RBIs with 23 while also smacking two home runs.

On the mound for the Lady Knights should be the duo of Meg Knudsen and Kelly Riedel. Knudsen currently has 10 wins against three losses and sports a 2.47 earned run average. In 96 and one-third innings pitched, Knudsen has given up 93 hits, struck out 37 and walked 21. Riedel (8-5) has an equally impressive ERA, 2.48, and has given up 68 hits, struck out 34 and walked 25, in 70 and two-thirds innings pitched.

I wish I had been born into a rock and roll band. Instead of putting me in my mother's arms in the delivery room, they'd hold my head in the kick drum and play three hours of very slow reggae.

That'll help me in subtle ways later on in life.

I don't need high school.

I need the Grateful Dead.

Tonight after dinner I'll sit mom down and have a heart to heart talk. I'm sure she'll let me go on tour. The Dead need me.

A few days later.....

Once again she suggested therapy. This is starting to get me down.

Lacrosse hopes to avenge Blue Hen loss

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

There are some striking similarities between last season and this one for the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, but the Minutemen would like them to end.

After four games of each of the last two seasons, UMass was 2–2. In game five of 1994, UMass trounced a much lesser opponent, Providence, by an 18–2 count.

Wednesday, UMass improved its current mark to 3–2 by routing lowly New Hampshire, 19–5.

In 1994, UMass built on the Friar frying with wins over Yale and UNH by a 28–14 aggregate.

Now UMass looks to win two in a row for the second time this year, but the competition has stiffened. The Minutemen host Delaware, only 3–6 but a consistent threat to top teams, Saturday at Richard F. Garber Field at 1 p.m.

The Minutemen's post season hopes died on Delaware Field one year ago in a crushing 14–13 defeat. The Blue Hens killed UMass' three game win streak, despite a balanced attack with four multiple goal scorers: Eric Bailey (3), Wes Depp (3), Brendan Glass (2) and Mike Valente (2).

UMass coach Greg Cannella would like to see the same type of goal distribution tomorrow. In Wednesday's rout, the attack created perfect spacing and allowed the top threats to flourish, both in transition and the standard "200" offense, in which Glass and Valente freelance.

"We do a lot of transition work in practice," Cannella said. "It's just how the game works. When you get the ball on your stick, you've got to run. You've got to sprint."

It has been 11 seasons since Delaware made lacrosse's version of the Big Dance, and it is not likely to get there this season with a record of 3–6. But there's no lack of motivation for UMass even though they can't return the favor of knocking its foe out of NCAA tournament running.

"[This game] is just tremendous," top goal scorer Glass (15) said. "No one our team has to get fired up for it. Everyone knows they're really the team that knocked us out of the tournament last year. Personally, I'm going to be really sky high."

If Glass fulfills his promise to be on top of his game, Saturday could be a thrilling two–man attraction. Glass' foil, senior attack Anthony DiMarzo, is one of America's top players. Already revered as one of the deadliest marksmen in Division I for his accomplishments in three years, DiMarzo has made this season his most productive. Through nine games, he has 26 goals and 27 assists for an amazing 53 points, bringing his career totals to 85–141–226.

"He's a three time All–American," Cannella said. "They're a good team. We scouted them last week, they beat us last year, so it's a big game for us."

In three games against ranked competition, Delaware has gone winless. The Blue Hens were just plucked by then–No. 20 Yale, 10–9, on March 4, but DiMarzo scored five goals.

In its next contest, Delaware could not contain then–No. 14 Hofstra, which prevailed 15–6. And then–No. 13 Navy sunk Delaware 11–6 on March 25. DiMarzo scored twice in each loss.

But the Blue Hens have some offensive depth, chiefly provided by freshman Brad Glowacki, who could be this year's top freshman in the mold of Glass. Glowacki, a product of Concord–Carlisle (Mass.) High School, the big rival for Glass' alma mater, Lincoln–Sudbury, has 21 goals.

Tom LoPresti and UD's Brian Cooper will tend the nets.

Delaware's last game was an 18–12 loss to then–No. 20 Towson State, and the next four games for Delaware (including Saturday) are with ranked teams.

This game and all others can be heard on WMUA, 91.1 FM, the flagship station for UMass men's lacrosse. Pre– game coverage begins at 12:50 p.m.

UM falls to Dartmouth; prepares to face Rutgers

By Allison Connolly
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team put up a good fight against No. 3 nationally ranked Dartmouth, but it was not good enough, losing to the Big Green Wednesday 15–5.

"I'm pleased with our game overall," Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan said. "We played a good team game, something we've been trying to emphasize."

Despite the loss, the Minutewomen proved they were up for the challenge of a top seed team, holding their opponent down and not letting them score for a full 17 minutes in the second half.

"Dartmouth got tired," McClellan said. "They are a running team and we ran with them."

UMass has been working on their team defense positioning and technique, showing its improvement against Dartmouth. With the solid goaltending of freshman Kate Brew, who had 17 saves in this game and is currently fourth nationally in save percentage, and the heady defensive skills of sophomore Erica Bryan, the Minutewomen provide quite an obstacle for the opposing offense. Sophomore Trish DiBenedetto also entered the game and had four saves.

However, it is the UMass offense that followed its game plan, working together and scoring with a team effort that included skillful passing and good communication.

"We've been working on the details of the game," McClellan said. "We took our passing game from Villanova and brought it to the Dartmouth game. We passed well on breaks, and scored or at least got a shot off every time."

Standouts offensively for UMass were freshman Joanna Dignazio, who had a hat trick, and freshman Vicky Nedomansky and sophomore Sarah Goddard, who both scored one apiece.

Dignazio leads the team in shots on goal and scoring in her first collegiate season, with a total of 36 shots and 13 goals.

UMass has snapped the jinx of having a good first half and losing it in the second, something that has plagued them so far in the season. In this game they were strong in both halves, running and passing consistently.

"This game was the turning point of our season," McClellan said. "It shows that we are prepared to take on the rest of the season."

With the Dartmouth experience behind them, the Minutewomen hope to explode against Rutgers. By comparison, UMass has the edge, having the better record against common foes.

Against Brown, Rutgers lost 7–4, as opposed to UMass who narrowly missed a victory by a one point loss in overtime. Likewise against St Joseph's, Rutgers prevailed 13–3 but UMass won by a larger margin, defeating them 19– 6. This weekend's matchup proves to be anybody's game. Rutgers' record is now (3–6) while UMass is (2–5).

For Rutgers, their offense is more experienced career wise, having five players with more than 30 goals under their belts as opposed to UMass, who has only two players' records exceeding this amount. However, UMass has a better overall shooting percentage for the current season with 0.393, while Rutgers has 0.261.

The Minutewomen also have a better save percentage with 0.648, as opposed to Rutgers who has 0.607.

Statistics will mean very little, however, when the teams take to the UMass homefield Saturday at 1 p.m.

Duquette's Sox may be on verge of beating curse

Around the Horn with Mike Brown

May the curse be broken.

The curse here being the famous curse of the Bambino. The Boston Red Sox have not won a World Series since 1918, right around the time George "Babe" Ruth was sold by Harry Frazee of the Sox to the New York Yankees.

"This is the Year" are the four words that have echoed around Beantown every spring for the last 75 years, and every summer the Sox have never failed to disappoint the fans of Fenway.

This new Red Sox team has many new faces and a new attitude.

Enter the Duke. Dan Duquette is the general manager and now it is his team on the field, not the washed–up names and head cases whom he inherited from former GM Lou Gorman, such as Andre Dawson and Jeff Russell. The Duke came from the Montreal Expos organization who last season fielded the team with the best record in Major League Baseball.

One would have to believe that Duquette had learned a few things from his former organization and arrived in Boston with a few tricks up his sleeve.

Starting from the top, the new GM's first good move was firing Butch Hobson. Daddy Butch was a friend of the team and not a good manager. He did a great job in Pawtucket with the Sox' minor league affiliate, but going through the motions doesn't cut it in the big show. The Duke hired Kevin Kennedy. Kennedy comes from the Texas Rangers organization and although he may not be the Yogi Berra the team needs, a Kennedy in Boston is a good concept.

Duquette then inks the better half of the former bush brothers. Jose Canseco is capable of knocking over the Green Monster. Don't expect any more 40 HR, 40 SB seasons out of Canseco, but many of his high fly balls in Oakland or Texas that were outs are going to turn into doubles off the wall. I wouldn't worry about Jose getting into too much trouble in Boston, it's pretty hard to speed in the traffic–jammed streets. Also, don't expect him to pitch at Fenway again.

As for Duquette's other signings, although none as major as perennial All–Star Canseco's, he made some solid transactions.

The addition of Mark Whiten to the outfield corps should prove to be a great move. Whiten is a big guy with some speed and power, along with arguably the best arm in the Major Leagues. Two seasons ago he hit 25 home runs and knocked in 99 runs. This guy may be underrated.

To the pitching rotation, Duquette complemented Ace Roger Clemens, Aaron Sele, and rookie Frank Rodriguez with former Mariner and Red, Erik Hanson. Hanson has had average numbers over his seven–year career, but managed to win 18 games

Minutewomen seek revenge against Rutgers

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

Revenge should definitely be a factor when the University of Massachusetts softball team meets up with Atlantic 10 rival Rutgers for a doubleheader today at 3 p.m. at Totman Field.

Last season, Rutgers ended the Minutewomen's season in the Atlantic 10 Tournament. After UMass captured the regular season A–10 title, the Minutewomen lost to Rutgers in the second round of the double elimination tournament and eventually met them again after defeating Temple. The Minutewomen had to defeat the Lady Knights twice to win the championship, but fell just short. They beat Rutgers, 5–4, to force a title game, but lost in the final game 3–1.

The loss also halted a string of five consecutive A–10 tournament championships for the Minutewomen.

In UMass' win against Rutgers in the A–10 tourney that forced the title game, centerfielder Stephanie Mareina knocked in the game–winning run with the biggest hit of her season to propel the Minutewomen to victory.

Sophomore third baseman Sam Cardenas will look to make the big hit if needed today and at the same time extend her 18–game hitting streak. Cardenas needs to hit safely in 10 more games to break the UMass school record of 27 set by Barb Marean in 1992.

The Lady Knights will come to Amherst with a 18–8 overall record, 5–1 in the A–10 conference, and currently second behind the 6–0 Minutewomen. As of April 3, Rutgers was leading the A–10 in batting average hitting .318 as a team.

UM hopes to extend winning streak to 12 against Dukes

Staff ace Jay Murphy will be on the mound when Massachusetts plays Duquesne this weekend.

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

Junior outfielder Ryan Jette will look to extend his 17 game hitting streak today when the University of Massachusetts baseball team battles Atlantic 10 rival Duquesne in Pittsburgh.

The two teams will play a doubleheader today at noon, and finish up the series with one game on Saturday.

The Dukes, currently the league's cellar dweller, stand at 9–23, 3–11 in the conference heading into this weekend's three game series with Minutemen.

UMass, however, is at the complete opposite end of the spectrum. The Minutemen's 10–1 conference record (16–6 overall) places them at the top of the league, and their doubleheader sweep of the University of Rhode Island ran the team's winning streak to 12 straight games.

Nobody on the squad is hotter than Jette. The leadoff man, who went 5–8 with three runs, three RBI and a couple of stolen bases against the Rams, has now hit safely in 17 straight games to raise his team leading average to .451, among the league's best. He is also one of the A–10's leaders in stolen bases with 11.

UMass places two other hitters in the league's top 10 as well, as junior outfielder Nelson Ubaldo (.412) and senior rightfielder Bill Knight (.387) join Jette on the list. Knight is also among the league leaders in home runs, with six, and RBI, with 26 on the year.

The Massachusetts bats have been on fire throughout the winning streak.

Catcher Andy Pelis, who smacked a homer against the Rams, has raised his average up to .309 with three dingers and 14 RBI on the season. Sophomore Nate Murphy has also been solid at the plate, hitting an even .300 while playing a near flawless centerfield.

The Dukes are led by Jim McCracken, who is sporting a .333 batting average, and Bryan Cornell, who leads the team with three home runs and 17 RBI, as well as 10 stolen bases.

As a team, Duquesne is batting .241, while the Minutemen are shining at the plate, hitting at a sparkling .321 clip.

Massachusetts coach Mike Stone is expected to go with ace righthander Jay Murphy (3–2, 3.63) and sophomore righty Chad Paronto (3–1, 3.03) on the mound today, and hurl freshman righthander Scott Barnsby (3–1, 3.55) tomorrow. Senior Jeff Michaels (2–0) and sophomore Jason Bennett (3–0) both picked up wins in the twinbill against URI.

The Minutemen received an extra boost this weekend when junior Mark Pileski, the team's starting shortstop and number two batter, returned to the starting lineup. Pileski had sat out three games after turning his ankle in batting practice.

With starting second baseman Muchie Dagliere and his .302 average also sitting on the bench due to injury, sophomore infielder Ryan Thistle has made the most of his playing opportunities. Thistle has hit .300 in nine games for the Minutemen without making an error in the field.

After this weekend's double dip, UMass will return home for a seven game homestand, their largest of the year.

The first game will be Tuesday afternoon when the Minutemen host Central Connecticut State. Hartford, Maine and Atlantic 10 rival Rutgers will also make an appearance at Earl Lorden Field.

Speakers stir Black–Jewish tension

By Chris Conner and Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

The college campus in the United States is often said to be a microcosm of society, a tiny reflecting pool among many where the youth of the nation adopt their behavioral roles for the future.

Black/Jewish Relations

At a public institution such as the University of Massachusetts, it is expected that greater student diversity will exist, and so history proves itself again: When different cultures occupy the same space, conflict ensues.

Such may be the root of the much–documented tensions between Black and Jewish students at UMass.

To the academian, it would seem the two factions might naturally bond, considering both peoples share a past marked by oppression.

Yet as evidenced on this campus, the information on the books is not representative of reality.

Clearly, the emotions of both groups have flared most cautically when the issue of speakers labeled anti–Semitic has arisen. Minister Louis Farrakhan being the most prominent of those figures in question.

The debate continued into the present school year when controversial Wellesley College professor Tony Martin made an appearance last semester, reigniting the sentiments that led to the Farrakhan explosion.

At the present time, there has been little to provoke protest from either side.

Really a Black–Jewish issue?

Shomwa Shamapande, president of the Black Student Union (BSU), and Nurti Ben–Harav, president of UMass Hillel, are leaders of the two communities who have offered insight into the situation on campus.

Both students agree that the emphasis on the nature of the conflict as solely a Black–Jewish issue is somewhat of a misnomer.

Shamapande, a senior majoring in legal studies, said he believes that faulty Black–Jewish relations are not the cause of the ill feelings between the two groups. Rather, he suggested the tension is reflective of the greater interracial troubles between Blacks and Whites.

"For it to be a Black–Jewish tension is unwarranted," Shamapande said.

The speaker dilemma

Shamapande cited the overall feeling within the Black community that certain elements within the White community do not respect the rights of Blacks to make decisions.

"It's a question of being treated as equals," Shamapande said. "There is a belief by the Jewish community that they have a hand in dictating or controlling who should speak on campus."

Ben–Harav, a senior psychology major, argued against such reasoning, and explained what she considers to be the cause of her community's adverse reaction to some of the speakers.

Student researchers recognized

By Robert Dunn
Collegian Correspondent

For the first time, undergraduate researchers from all the University of Massachusetts campuses were honored in an all–day conference held yesterday in the Lincoln Campus Center.

The researchers from throughout the UMass system displayed the results of their work on bulletin boards in the Campus Center Auditorium and gave oral presentations in adjoining conference rooms.

Approximately 131 undergraduate researchers particlpated in the conference, competing for a total of $2,500 in cash awards.

Judging of the projects was conducted by faculty from all UMass campuses. Ten of the 25 award winners conducted their research at the Amherst campus. The awards were presented by UMass President Michael K. Hooker, who spoke about his enthusiasm for the conference.

"As long as I am president of UMass, this is going to be a growing, annual event and I will always be here to participate," said Hooker.

In addition to the researchers, approximately 220 others attended the conference.

"The turnout was much better than we anticipated. For the first one, I think this is great," said Linda Nolan, honors director at UMass–Amherst.

Nolan said that she had the idea for a conference of this type some time ago and proposed the idea to her counterparts from the other three UMass campuses last year.

This is the first time undergraduate research has been recognized this way, she said.

The research does not end with the presentation, however. It is part of an ongoing process, according to Christina Baxter, a researcher working on mechanical alternatives to using mice as subjects in toxicity tests.

"The research still goes on, 40 hours a week, every week," she said.

Nolan stressed the importance of conducting actual research at the undergraduate level instead of redoing established, "cookbook–type" experiments.

"A lot of students write undergraduate theses but don't present them in a research format," said Daniel Castellano, a junior marketing major whose research investigated the controversy surrounding Ice T's 1992 song, "Cop Killer."

"I think this is really good to work out the kinks that might come up in future years," Castellano said.

Awards were given to projects in four separate categories: humanities, life sciences, physical sciences and social and behavioral sciences. All prizes were $100 cash.

The prizes, while appreciated, weren't motivation to participate in the conference, according to Kristen Sorenson, a senior communication major, who studied the impact of television on female self–esteem.

UMass student killed in pickup truck accident

WHATELY — A University of Massachusetts student died in a one–car crash early Sunday morning, according to state police.

Taylor Y. Lincoln of 619 South East St., Amherst, was pronounced dead at the scene of the accident. Police said he was driving his pickup truck on Interstate Route 91 when his vehicle strayed from his lane, crossed the median strip, then hit a tree on the driver's side of the pickup.

The truck stopped facing south in the northbound lane of I–91 and burst into flames. A passing motorist pulled Lincoln from the truck, police said.

The accident occurred at 3:35 a.m. and is under investigation.

Lincoln was a senior majoring in resource economics. He worked last summer at MASSPIRG.

Fees may go up at state schools despite vote

By Robert W. Trott
Associated Press

BOSTON — Tuition won't be going up at Massachusetts public colleges and universities — but student fees might.

The Higher Education Coordinating Council voted Thursday not to raise tuition this year, and also recommended that the schools not raise fees.

The HECC's move comes a week after the University of Massachusetts system decided to hold the line on tuition, but increase its student fees.

Massachusetts public universities are among the most expensive in the nation, thanks mostly to budget cuts in the late 1980s and early 1990s that put more of the burden on students.

The coordinating council controls tuition at the state's four–year colleges and community colleges, but does not have authority over student fees, beyond a recommendation.

For the past couple of years, however, the schools have followed the HECC's recommendations on student fees.

Also, the HECC does not set tuition and fees at the UMass system's five campuses.

"There will be no increase in tuition, and we will do all we can to convince local boards of trustees that fees which students have to pay also be kept at a minimum," HECC Chancellor Stanley Koplik said.

"You can call something tuition or you can call something a mandatory fee. As a student or a parent paying the bill there is no difference whatsoever in terms of the cost," Koplik said. The individual colleges and universities will set their fees during the coming months before the fall semester begins.

Tuition at the nine state colleges other than UMass is $1,408, and slightly higher — $1,463 — at the Massachusetts College of Art and the Massachusetts Maritime Academy.

Tuition at the 15 community colleges ranges from $1,080 to $1,026.

Koplik said that while the UMass fee increases were regrettable, officials there apparently made their case to the students.

"At least they have talked to students all along the way," he said. "The students clearly feel they will be getting some service in return for that increase in fees."

The UMass fee increases ranged from 3 percent for Amherst campus students to 300.6 percent for graduate nursing students at the medical school in Worcester.

Also at the HECC's April meeting, council members vowed to fight a House proposal to eliminate a $500,000 dual enrollment program that allows high school students to take college courses. The program gives the students credit toward college as well as high school.

"It is being sacrificed and nobody knows why," said state Education Secretary Piedad Robertson.

The program was trimmed by House members who earmarked the money for cities and towns to spend on education during budget negotiations.

AIDS educator learned lessons the hard way

By Wendy Darling

When Derek Cash was 12 years old, he heard about a new disease.

"Oh, my God," he and his classmates snickered. "Rock Hudson — he's a fag, he's dead, he got AIDS."

Ten years after the actor's death, Cash knows more about AIDS and the virus that causes it than he probably would have liked to.

"A very large number of my friends and close personal confidants are HIV positive or have AIDS," said Cash, who is a student at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Three years ago, Cash's best friend Beth told him that she was HIV positive. She was a recovering intravenous drug user. It was the first time Cash had met someone who was open about having the virus or the disease.

Before that, he says, he had probably known many people who were infected or already sick but chose not to tell him. Being active in the gay community, HIV and AIDS would have been impossible to escape.

These days, Cash said, he has 25 to 30 close friends who are HIV positive or have AIDS. On a more casual level, he knows "at least 50 if not a 100" more.

Many of these are gay men from Provincetown, where Cash has lived on and off for the past four years. However, Cash also knows individuals from the Boston area, where he works for AIDS Action Committee. Most of these men are White and in their 30s.

Facing AIDS–related deaths

In Provincetown, where there are many gay men who are infected or sick, the attitude toward death is pragmatic.

"People are very upset and distressed that this person we all knew and loved died, but there's also a sense that the suffering is over," Cash said. "We all have to go on with our lives because next week someone else is going to die."

Cash knows or has known several young adults and teenagers who have been affected by HIV and/or AIDS. His best friend Beth died of complications from AIDS in March 1994.

"She was 23," he said, "and she's dead."

Before her death, Beth did a lot to get him involved in HIV/AIDS activism and education, he says. Five years ago, she was the one who brought him to his first meeting of ACT–UP, the AIDS Coalition to Unleash Power.

ACT–UP is a radical political action group that stages public demonstrations to garner publicity for HIV/AIDS and the people who have it.

"That's where I first really got into it and was an activist," Cash said. "I was yelling. I was screaming. I was venting all the frustration I had about being young and queer."

That frustration eventually led him to do needle exchange work in places like Roxbury. He and his friend Beth would go there with ACT–UP and "stand up all day and give junkies clean needles," he said.

Speaker discusses effects of proposed legislation

By Michael C.L. Elliott
Collegian Correspondent

The transfer of Congressional control to the Republicans will lead to profound changes in United States–Africa policy and may result with significant reductions in U.S. aid programs, according to Dr. Daniel Volman of the Africa Research Project, who spoke at Hampshire College Thursday night.

In his speech entitled, "The New Republican Congress and the United States–Africa policy," Volman specified legislation that, if passed, would have "dramatic effects" on current Africa policy.

The $800 million Africa Development fund, which guarantees a specific amount of money each year to Africa, is "extremely likely" to be eliminated by Republican lawmakers in the coming years, Volman said. The fund provides countries with the necessary capital to improve infrastructure, from seaports to schools.

As part of the Recision Bill, which re–allocated already budgeted dollars for fiscal year 1995, $62 million has been cut from the Africa Development Bank, nearly half of its budget, and redirected to the Pentagon to cover debts from operations in Haiti and Somalia. This cut was signed by President Clinton on April 10, Volman said.

The Republican leadership is also considering reducing a special $600 million aid package for South Africa, promised by Clinton to President Nelson Mandela earlier this year.

These aid packages, Volman pointed out, "represent trivial amounts of money." But, such programs "have very few defenders (in Congress) so they are eliminated ... African countries will have to compete for the little U.S. aid available."

These monetary changes will be

HIV/AIDS education began when Beth started to get sick.

"She told me I had to, more or less," he said. "She made it very clear that ... I could definitely use my talents as an educator and keep people from suffering the same way that she was."

The first speaking engagement he had was at Cape Cod Community College. He was 18 years old when he was invited to speak at two gatherings, one about his experience as a young gay man, the other about the way HIV/AIDS had affected his life.

Since then Cash has done HIV/AIDS education in a wide variety of settings. As a student at the College of the Atlantic in Maine, he helped work on a theater outreach program, condom distribution, and general HIV/AIDS education. Cash also spoke at local high schools and was involved with the Down East AIDS Network.

"I kind of go where anybody asks me to go," he said.

Cash has worked for AIDS Action Committee since last September. He began as an educator giving talks to small groups about HIV/AIDS and safer sex. Today he has a part- time administrative position coordinating these talks.

Work at UMass and plans for the future

As a junior at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, Cash is pursuing a Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration in HIV/AIDS education. He has worked with Health Services to try to improve the University's education program. On April 12 he co-facilitated a workshop for gay and bisexual men on HIV/AIDS, safer sex and intimacy.

"This is what I plan to be doing for the rest of my life," he said. "Maybe not [leading workshops], but more doing training and specifically working with target groups like gay and bisexual men, IV drug users or hemophiliacs."

Cash said he is happy about his chosen course in life.

"I've found something that I'm very good at," he said. "And you now, it's a nice thing to know that I can get paid to talk about sex and help people in the process."

Shahak remains a fighter for justice

By Juan José Chacón Quirós de Quetzalcoatl
Collegian Staff

Political activist, distinguished scientist, noted scholar, Holocaust survivor — Dr. Israel Shahak's reputation as Israel's foremost campaigner for peace and justice in the Middle East continues to grow. Shahak visited the University of Massachusetts last week as part of a speaking tour of the United States.

Shahak was born in Warsaw, Poland, on April 28, 1933 into a family of rabbis and leather merchants. In 1942, the family was removed by the Nazi German occupiers to the Poniatowa concentration camp.

Israel and his mother survived the internment, although his father did not. They were moved to the Bergen–Belsen camp before liberation in 1945, when Shahak was just 12 years old. Later, they joined the stream of Jewish settlers leaving for Palestine.

There, Shahak received his formal education, culminating in a Ph.D. in chemistry. Becoming a distinguished academic in Israel, Shahak has risen to the position he currently holds — professor emeritus in chemistry at Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

His activism in politics dates from an incident during the mid–1960s, which he describes in his latest book, Jewish History, Jewish Religion: The Weight of Three Thousand Years.

One Saturday in Jerusalem, Shahak witnessed a man collapse in the street, and the subsequent refusal of an orthodox resident to allow his telephone to be used to summon an ambulance on the grounds that the man was a gentile and it would violate the Sabbath.

Shahak initiated a "media scandal" about the event, even approaching the Jerusalem Rabbinical Court for a ruling on the matter, and was shocked that the court ruled that the man had acted "correctly" and even "piously" in refusing this aid. The ensuing debate, along the 1967 war and the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, propelled him into a life of political activism.

Shahak spent 25 years as the chair of the Israeli League for Human Rights and Civil Rights, and has railed against what he calls "Israeli apartheid" against Palestinians. An example he often cites is the fact that all publicly owned land in Israel, and more than 70 percent of land in the Occupied Territories, is reserved exclusively for Jews and no Palestinian or other non– Jew may use it in any way.

Shahak has also consistently drawn a connection between certain traditions of Talmudic Judaism and Israel's posture towards Palestinians and other Arabs both in his new book, and in a famous essay "The Jewish Religion and Its Attitude to Non–Jews." He says that Israel's system of legal discrimination is based on the secularization of these intolerant aspects of Talmudic Judaism.

Shahak says that he has come to view the colonization of Palestine by European Jews as a mistake, initiating a new colonialism just as others were beginning to collapse. He advocates Palestinian armed struggle in the cause of Palestinian statehood, in spite of his 35 years as an Israeli Army reservist.

As a result of his political activism in the cause of justice and human rights, Israel Shahak has been subjected to numerous hateful attacks and harassments from almost all quarters in Israel. He has been accused of betraying his father to the Nazis, and had his own death called for in columns written in papers such as The Jerusalem Post.

In spite of the strain of living as a dissident, Israel Shahak remains as active today as ever, and his reputation as a fighter for justice continues to grow.

Delta Sigma Phi fraternity opens new chapter at UM

By Marnie Thomel
Collegian Staff

The 13th largest national fraternity, Delta Sigma Phi, opened a new chapter at the University of Massachusetts this semester.

A group of men from the ninth floor of Kennedy residence hall wanted to join a fraternity last semester, but did not know how to choose one, according to Eric Lally, vice president and founder.

"We wanted to rush a fraternity, we just didn't know which one," said Eric Lally, freshman vice president.

Lally's older brother is a member of Delta Sigma Phi at the University of Hartford, where Lally and his friends had visited.

Lally told his friends about the fraternity and what a great chapter it was, he said.

"[Lalli and friends] got the idea not to join a fraternity, but start one," said freshman secretary Darryl Murphy.

From there the idea snowballed, according to Murphy.

"We had about 40 people showing up, but we lost people over winter break," he said.

On Thursday, March 31, with 17 official members, Delta Sigma Phi was officially recognized by the Inter–Fraternity Council at the University. The chapter has also been nationally recognized by Delta Sigma Phi.

Member Kevin Weiner said the group has grown faster than he expected.

"I'm amazed how far we have gone in such little time," he said.

The fraternity is looking to expand even more, according to Murphy.

"Our goal is to become one of the biggest and strongest and most influential fraternities on campus," Murphy said.

Although some members have rank positions, every member is a pledge, according to Murphy.

"If someone joined tomorrow, they would be on the same level as we are," he said. "This is our incentive to get people to join."

Delta Sigma Phi doesn't work with the new brother system because new members are no less important, said President Ryan O'Connor.

"We founded on the basis of friendship, brotherhood and equality," O'Connor said. "Each member had equal say and equal role. We all want to be more than friends, we want to be brothers, friends for life."

According to Murphy, Delta Sigma Phi was the first fraternity in the nation to accept Christian and Jewish members.

"Delta Sigma Phi was founded on diversity ... we will take any person of quality from anywhere," he said.

The brothers are still looking for new members and trying to publicize the new fraternity, according to Murphy.

"We have flyers out on campus and in some of the dorms," he said. "Word of mouth is a big thing, though."

The group is also stressing academics ahead of the fraternity, said Murphy.

A brother must have a 2.2 grade point average to be in the fraternity, he said.

"We currently have a [overall] 2.89 grade point average. We definitely stress academics," Murphy said. "Your main purpose at school is to study — to join a fraternity is to make your experience more rounded."

coupled with proposed consolidations of State Department agencies, which Volman worries would "de–prioritize Africa" in Washington. He said that many Republicans see "no vital interest in" in the region.

Two bills pending in Congress relating to U.S. participation in United Nations peacekeeping mandates may also have adverse effects on U.S.–Africa policy, Volman said.

The Peace Powers Act, introduced by Sen. Robert Dole (R–Ka.) and the National Security Revitalization Act, a provision of the Republican Contract with America, both seek to curtail U.S. partipation in such operations by limiting the amount of peacekeeping expenses from the current level of 32 percent of the total budget to 25 percent. "It is unlikely that other countries can make–up that difference," Volman said.

Despite these noted reductions in what are considered "nation–building" initiatives, Volman doubts the United States will remove funding for disaster relief programs. "U.S. policy toward Africa tends to be so crisis–driven," he said.

Future U.S. intervention must likely will not mean "economic development and conflict resolution," Volman said. However, humanitarian relief operations, fueled by public sentiment when Americans see starving children on the evening news, should continue.

One of the most obvious fears U.S. leadership has about large–scale involvement in Africa with American forces is that of being drawn into a quagmire, as the now–abandoned intervention in Somalia is viewed, according to Volman.

Many members of Congress further worry that the spread of Islam throughout Africa is evolving into "an equivalent to communism," he said comparing it to a transnational force united against the United States, making them all the more skeptical of funding African assistance programs.

General misconceptions on the part of the American public towards U.S. foreign aid expenditures, as Volman explained, are, in addition, prompting these policy changes.

He cited a recent poll in which a majority of Americans believed that 20 to 30 percent of the total federal budget went to foreign countries in the form of aid, and resolved that 4 to 5 percent would be a more "reasonable" amount. In the fiscal year 1994, one percent of the total U.S. budget went to such areas.

"I didn't really do this to get an award, I did this because I've done a substantial amount of research and I wanted to share what I've learned with other people," Sorenson said.

UMass Provost Patricia Crosson compared the researchers to marathon runners.

"What you have done to get here takes the same kind of determination, the kind of commitment, the kind of drive, that they have had to display to get to the Boston Marathon," she told the presenters.

Several hour–long workshops were also offered at the conference, discussing studying abroad, writing resumes, applying to graduate school, and writing theses.

The conference was co–sponsored by the honors programs from the Amherst, Boston, Dartmouth and Lowell campuses, and was underwritten by the UMass President's Office.

Solutions for better education

For many years political leaders with great flourish have identified the need for a world class public higher education system to advance the economic, political and social needs of the Commonwealth. However, few have moved beyond lip service to propose solutions to help the state's public colleges and universities realize their potential. Aside from the absence of a long-term funding commitment, the lack of clear, consistent financing policies continues to undermine public higher education in Massachusetts.

The University of Massachusetts and the state and community colleges are all still badly bruised from the 35 percent cut in state funds they sustained during the fiscal crisis. To compensate for the dramatic loss in state funds, student charges at the institutions rose an average of 112 percent from 1988 to 1992, with an astounding 167 percent increase at UMass–Amherst. While tuition and fees soared, state needs–based financial aid was cut in half.

Currently, our 15 community colleges, nine state colleges and the five–campus University of Massachusetts system are among the highest priced in the country, ranking first, seventh and fourth respectively.

In an effort to extend to higher education a funding commitment backed by a continuum of financing policies similar to that of the K–12 Education Reform Act, I added language to the fiscal 1994 budget creating the Task Force on Fair Share Funding for Public Higher Education. Determining the "fair share" of educational costs to be borne by the state and the fair share to be borne by students and their families was at the heart of the task force's work.

Last May, the task force proposed an additional investment of $220 million spread over a five–year period: $153 million in state appropriations; $39 million from students through their tuition and fees; and the remaining $26 million from "other sources" which include federal financial aid, grants, contracts and institutional fundraising.

Stan Rosenberg

More than two dozen state senators and representatives have filed legislation which incorporates the task force recommendations by achieving three goals:

1. Five–year stabilization plan. This would enable the colleges and universities to plan, build and improve programs, and manage efficiently.

• Formula budgeting. Each sector of the public higher education system would use funding formulas approved by the Higher Education Coordinating Council (HECC) to calculate their campus budget requests.

• A sustained state investment. The state would fully fund its portion of the formulas by the year 2000. A $220 million investment from all sources (state appropriations, student charges and other sources) would fill the gap between the current level of funding for the system, and the formula need.

• Endowment funds. An incentive plan would help build campus–based endowments to supplement state and student funding. The state would match non–state funds, in varying amounts.

2. Improved student access. Predictable student charges would enable students and their families to plan rationally for meeting college costs.

• Student charges. The student's fair share at the UMass and the state colleges would be 33 percent of the cost of education, and for community college students, 25 percent. Once funding formula goals are achieved, students could not be asked to contribute more than their "fair share."

• Increased financial aid.

3. Accountability and improved management. Public colleges and universities are accountable to the public for proper and efficient use of their funding, and for achieving state education goals.

• Budgeting tools. The ability to carry over funds from one year to the next, stabilization pools and a two–year budget cycle would improve fiscal planning.

• Performance indicators and outcome goals. The campuses and HECC would develop performance indicators and outcome goals, to help measure the schools against peer institutions in other states. UMass President Michael K. Hooker has already launched such a project in his annual report card.

• Benchmark study. This study would establish a baseline for measuring progress on management and program objectives.

• Annual audit. Each institution would submit annual audited financial statements to HECC, the state comptroller, and the House and Senate Committee on Ways and Means.

The time for rhetoric has passed. It's time for action. The Fair Share funding proposal is a clear and manageable plan to realize our oft–stated vision of a world class public higher education system. Such a system — here and across the country — provides the only opportunity for a college education to thousands of low and moderate income students. This is how we will guarantee an internationally competitive economy and a bright future for this generation, and those to come. Once again, it is time for Massachusetts to invest in the power of knowledge.

State Sen. Stan Rosenberg (D–Amherst) is the vice chairman of the Joint Committee on Education.

Rap needs to face the music

For some time now the philosophical ponderance of what is wrong with our society has been whispered in the corners of cafes, talked about in the smoky booths of local bars and debated in the confines of the classroom: there are no role models for the youth of America. As the youth struggle to find what is their own, they are left to wander through gun fire, needles and pipes, unemployment and the risk of AIDS — without any leaders to point them in the right direction.

E. C. Thomas

Instead of passionate leaders conveying messages of hope, understanding and inspiration, the position of "role model" has been answered by commercials, advertisements and public service announcements.

My favorite is from the "Say No to Drugs" campaign, where a young guy spots a pretty girl at a party, begins to walk over to make contact, and upon seeing her take a drag off a joint, turns around and walks the other way. Somehow I think there are bigger issues to tackle, and the idea of a pretty–boy representing the good in all of us doesn't stir me with much motivation to end the drug scene.

Looking at youth today, there is one clear force behind the clothes we wear, the way we talk, and our attitudes about life: music. Music has always been an outlet for teenage angst, and the desire to look and be like one's favorite musician is not any newfound aspiration.

So when rap began its ascent into modern culture and popular mediums, it was inevitable that the sagging jeans, bandannas and over–sized sweatshirts and flannels would become the wave of fashion, cutting across racial lines and geographical boundaries. However, the flip side was perfecting the image of gangster. Rappers extoll the virtues of bullets, bitches, 40–ouncers and attitudes of "Fuck the Police!" — which although may be the expressive truth of street life, has promoted more violence and promiscuity.

And then, Eazy–E, a major rap star, died of AIDS last week in Los Angeles. He was the first prominent member of the rap industry to die of the disease, but not the first to make tragic headlines. Dr. Dre is currently serving five months in a half–way house for violating his 1993 probation on assault charges. He was arrested by the LAPD in 1994 after a car chase.

His close colleague Snoop Doggy Dogg was arrested in 1993 on murder–conspiracy charges. He has pleaded not guilty for the trial that begins this week. Tupac Shakur, both rapper and actor, was arrested in 1995 for the shooting of two off–duty Atlanta police officers.

Those charges were dropped, only to be replaced in 1994 with sexual abuse, for which he is now serving up to four and a half years in prison.

One has to wonder if the headlines are sending a wake–up call to the youth of today. On his deathbed, Eazy–E emphasized that anyone could get AIDS — that it "doesn't discriminate." Some found the news of his death a clear message that cutting down on the number of sexual partners and practicing safe sex is a good idea — what a shocking revelation. I find it somewhat disheartening to know it takes a rapper to die of AIDS to finally get the message out. No doubt countless not–so–famous others from the genre have already contracted the disease or died of it.

For some youth, people dying young and going to jail is an "everyday thing" — no cause for soul searching. For others the idea of being considered a gangster is not giving a damn, not caring what people think of you because "people respect that."

I'm not sure which makes me more bewildered, the fact that society has chosen to blame rappers for the state of youth today, or the fact that rappers don't take any responsibility for the messages and lifestyle they endorse. The ultimate, bottom line reality is that children are dying and going to jail. The youth aren't invincible, but they are impressionable. I can't help but wonder what would happen if instead of putting the reality to rhythms and sound, rappers put the fact that the reality isn't the way things ought to be and how to motivate changing it. Maybe then the bottom line wouldn't be so "everyday."

Letters to the Editor

Important RSO needs new life

To the editor:

There is an old and important organization dying on campus — not because it does not perform a necessary function, but because no one participates to keep it running. The UMass Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance has been one of the driving forces keeping social events and political advances in the interests of gay, lesbian and bisexual students on campus running. Why is it dying?

There is almost no participation outside of attendance at the dances that the LBGA holds three to four times a semester and even these have become sparsely attended. The past two weekly Info–Socials, events designed both for socialization and to inform the members of the LBGA of events concerning the community, have had an attendance conslsting solely of the organizlation's steering committee.

Traditionally the LBGA has always had a core of solid long–term members that changed gradually over time and also a much larger overall membership who would show up to meetings and other events occasionally. Now it seems that no one shows up, not even this long–time core group.

This is complicated by the fact that the steering committee members are new to their positions and are still getting into the "swing of things." As a member of the steering committee, I know how difficult it can be to get everything organized, especially given the number of resignations and replacements that have occurred during this semester. Still, these are not insurmountable obstacles. The steering committee is on its feet again with dedicated individuals who want the organization to thrive.

The committee cannot do this alone. A group, even a dedicated group, consisting of only five people can only do so much. We keep the Info–Socials happening, despite falling attendance levels. We keep dances happening, despite lack of members to poster for them and advertise, even by word of mouth. We keep the office open and well–organized. We even try to keep on top of the political events on campus that concern our membership and the GLB community at large.

I have heard people criticize the committee and the LBGA as a whole. Unfortunately, none of these critics seems willing to divulge their reasoning or suggest ways to improve the organization. The steering committee is made up of students, we are human and make mistakes. We cannot make changes in the organization unless the LBGA members tell us what they want changed. What are we doing so wrong that attendance has dropped? How can we make this organization what the members want it to be?

We try to listen to the criticism we receive to make changes and improvements. A few weeks ago the members attending the Info–Social remarked that the LBGA office was not being properly staffed. Since that time the steering committee has endeavored to make sure we had someone in the office for several hours each day.

I realize that the semester got off to a rocky start for the LBGA. With the resignations and new elections the business at our meetings was dry and dusty, and I'll admit it — we didn't even have food or refreshments, something normally provided at our Info–Socials.

What is needed now is participation. The last time involvement in the LBGA became this scarce it was necessary to close the office and cancel all events to draw the attention of the community until participation was restored. I hope that such a drastic measure will not become a necessity.

This is a plea to lesbian, gay and bisexual students — PLEASE come to the Info–Socials and help us revitalize this organization. I don't think a few hours each Tuesday night is too much to ask. I don't think any of us want it to die.

TAX Day demonstration

To the editor:

The Western Massachusetts chapter of the Share the Wealth project will be holding a demonstration tonight at 9:45 p.m. at the main branch of the Amherst Post Office on University Drive. The TAX Day demonstration will include dramatic street theatre and educational leafletting.

Share the Wealth is a national organization whose mission is to focus public attention on the widening inequality in our country and the social costs of the disparity of wealth on our economy, politics and culture. The demonstration is intended to educate those who are filing their tax returns, that the tax burden has been shifted off the wealthy and mega–corporations and onto the middle class working people of our nation.

No other industrialized nation in the world has such a wide disparity of wealth and poverty. Our national economic policies have doubled (in the last 15 years) the share of wealth held by the wealthiest 1 percent of our country from 17 percent to 37 percent. This escalating inequality has resulted in decreased economic security for most of us and decreased quality of life.

Chapters of Share the Wealth across the United States will be holding TAX Day actions tonight as well.

Spending cuts need to be examined

To the editor:

In the recent months of Republican spending–cuts mania, welfare has often been targeted as an unnecessary expenditure. The welfare system does need to be overhauled, but in terms of wasting money, there are bigger targets. Military spending is the biggest and warrants close inspection.

Aside from food stamps, "welfare" generally refers to AFDC (Aid to Families with Dependent Children) which makes up a mere 1 percent of the federal budget. The $14.4 billion that we spend on it does not amount to much when compared to the $270 billion that pays for the "defense" of the United States. At the height of the Cold War, the Reagan Administration had boosted military spending to only $100 billion, slightly more than a third of what it is now. The Cold War is over and we have no enemies to speak of. In fact, following the U.S. lead, the next 10 biggest military spenders are our allies. This spending may even be increasing threats to national defense since more than 25 percent of military equipment produced by the United States is sold as export to other countries.

Now, both the Clinton Administration and the Republican Party have called for an increase in our already ludicrous military budget. This is an abysmal waste of money proposed by two parties that are supposedly concerned with reducing our national debt.

All of this, of course, comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers, as we finance the fancy lifestyles of government officials and corporate tycoons. Meanwhile, GE and Raytheon get massive subsidies and pay less taxes than we do. In a time when government social services are so desperately needed, this sort of corruption is economically, politically and socially irresponsible.

Gender differences are cultural

To the editor:

This letter is in response to Evan Young's opinions about "Tackling the idea of equality." It seems to me, a mere womyn, that Evan has less than no idea of what he's talking about. He states that he feels womyn are biologically programmed to be home–makers, and men are the set "breadwinners," and that it has been so since the beginning of humans. If he looked for fact when forming his opinions, he would see just how incorrect he is. He would see that many indigenous peoples were matriarchal cultures, where womyn were the warriors, the leaders. He would see that most of the time, men's work was defined by what womyn did not do, not vice versa. In the cultures where males were, in fact, the hunters, they weren't considered more important; because often the hunt was not a reliable source of food. It was gathering and foraging that was a reliable source of food, whether those gatherers were male or female.

It was through the formation of Western culture, and its stratified system, that the opposite begins to become true. It was when the concept of private property came into play that womyn became of lesser value in society. Through colonization, these concepts spread to non–Western people.

He keeps repeating that these differences between men and womyn are caused by biology. I would ask him to show me the fact. Show me the gene for hunting and fighting, the gene for cleaning and nurturing. The answer is there are none. Here, there is no biological truth, only cultural truth. Nature vs. nurture. Yes, womyn are the determined sex for incubation, but that's are far as it goes. Beyond that is nurture and it is not segregated to womyn. Nurture has no biology.

To close, I would have to say that Evan is suffering from a deflated ego he would like to inflate by thinking that he, as a man, procures a higher position than womyn in society. I think that Evan would do well to begin reading up on his opinions. I suggest Science and Gender by Ruth Bleir.

The womb is not the womyn, our definition is much more whole than that.

Oh, and by the way Evan, we are not asking for equality, we are demanding it. And we don't expect anything from you, except to get the hell out of our way.

JILL SOBULE
Jill Sobule
Lava Records

Though she looks like a folk version of Tank Girl on the cover of her debut CD, Jill Sobule is clearly a softie. Which doesn't mean she's a pushover. Swinging from smart to sexy without missing a beat, Sobule is alternately charming and sensuous on her self–titled effort. A descendant of the Juliana Hatfield school of catchy angst pop, Sobule soars on tracks like "I Kissed a Girl" and "Karen By Night," modulating her squeaky, little–girl voice into a heavenly form of auditory innocence.

Like Ms. Hatfield, Sobule can be a little too self– consciously clever, using simple rhymes as a vessel of cuteness. However, Sobule is only intermittently annoying and she wears you down quickly enough on tunes like "Good Person Inside," "Margaret" and "The Jig is Up," the arrangements are spare but instantly hummable, and it's a prime showcase for Sobule's charming storyteller strengths. You just may be hooked. B+ (Jon Lupo)

DO YOU WANNA RIDE?
Adina Howard
EMI Records

Snoop Doggy Dogg — the feminine version. There's just no getting around it.

Adina Howard's fishnet–clad legs and leather–clad butt on the front cover cannot make up for the fact that the album is really bad. Howard is trying to be a tougher version of hip hop group En Vogue and Top 40 sensation Mary J. Blige. It just doesn't work.

All the background samples are overused. The album sounds as though it has been recycled from someone else's unused stuff. Basically, it sounds like a better band's garbage tracks.

Most of the songs center around the topic of sex — which isn't a bad thing, if you have something new to say. Howard doesn't. She even has dialogue like "about the dog in me." Shout out to Snoop, complete with barking.

Tracks like "You Got Me Humpin'," "Freak Like Me," "Do You Wanna Ride?" and "Horny For Your Love" are just plain tired.

The little bits of dialogue and phone calls that make up "I Wants Ta Eat" and "Let's Go To Da Sugar Shack" sound like hip hop versions of the Jerky Boys. Why is this necessary? There are 13 songs on the CD, why the filler?

Songs also contain ridiculous lyrics like, "I'm just sitting in my Jacuzzi, sipping on a phat (or is it fat) glass of Dom Perignon," and "As I lay here, just smoking on a blunt..."

To be fair, her slow songs show potential, but she should start off by firing both the songwriter and the mixer.

Skip the first album and read the reviews if she manages to put out another. D (Tracy Monahan)

NED'S ATOMIC DUSTBIN
Brainbloodvolume
Furtive Records

Part of the unlikely Stourbridge mafia, which peaked in popularity circa 1991 with the little lamented Wonder Stuff and the inoffensively awful Pop Will Eat Itself, Ned's Atomic Dustbin had their three minutes of fame with the uncharacteristically corking "Happy."

They have since been usurped by the new wave of British white boy guitar bands, but now they return with their third album and, at least, the lodestone of Ned's Possibly the Worst Bandname Ever lifted from their backs by the ludicrous Hootie & the Blowfish and Toad the Wet Sprocket. So?

Well, ho hum really. It opens with the disappointing single "All I Ask of Myself Is That I Hold Together," which consists of the title refrain relentlessly repeated in a variety of emotions ranging from A to B, intermittently underscored with a "haunting" organ sound intended to showcase the Neds' self–conscious musical "maturity" — superficial conceit also affected on the following track, "Floote," which features, uh, a flute.

And so it catatonically continues, competent rock emphasizing guitar distortion and driving drums, rarely suggesting the innovation required to be noticed in these diverse times. Rising above the morass of mediocrity are "Premonition," "Talk Me Down," and "To Be Right," the anthemic attitude of the last eerily evocative of U2. The shortcomings of the album are really shockingly revealed by the uninspiring final triptych of tracks, two of the titles unintentionally ironic to the numbed listener — "I Want It Over" and "Song Eleven Could Take Forever."

Unlike the Wonder Stuff's lnane and insufferable Miles Hunt, now an MTV Europe presenter, none of the Ned's have charisma, and neither do their compositions. Ned's Atomic Dustbin are heading for the bargain bin rather than the Buzz Bin, I fear. D (Martyn Bone)

Neeson, Lange shine in robust Rob Roy epic

By Jon Lupo
Collegian Staff

ROB ROY
Directed by Michael Caton–Jones with Liam Neeson, Jessica Lange
Tim Roth & John Hurt
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

At the heart of Rob Roy, director Michael Caton–Jones' (This Boy's Life) robust and thrilling new yarn, is a struggle over Honor. That's right, not just ordinary honor, but old time, near–pathological honor, the kind that, if the hero just let it go once and while, things would be a whole lot more peaceful. Of course, then there wouldn't be much of a movie.

Crafted with minimum style (the film's only glaring handicap) it's more than made up for by impeccable performance and a steady, assured hand. As Rob Roy, the toughest, most honorable stud in the Scottish highlands, Liam Neeson proves he's a movie star. The fact that he does all of this in a kilt proves he's more than one too.

But it's turns by recent Oscar winner Jessica Lange as Roy's wife, Mary, and Tim Roth (Pulp Fiction) as the outwardly effete but ruthlessly sadistic villain who emerge as the film's truest touchstones. They contribute to Rob Roy's welcome dark streak, a strength that makes the film supersede what could have been an overheated "epic" starring Kevin Costner (doing to the Scottish accent what he did to the Queen's English in Robin Hood). Thankfully, Rob Roy avoids a blockbuster mentality for something ultimately more, uh, honorable.

Neeson's Roy borrows £1,000 from a power–hungry English lord (John Hurt) in order to invest in the future of his village. His collateral? His word, of course ... and acres of land. Roth, playing the ne'r–do–well English title of dubious parentage, steals the money in order to keep him in high style. Neeson balks at paying back the money, and Hurt is offended at his dripping integrity and apparent insolence and moves to arrest him. Neeson escapes, and Roth is dispatched to find him. But when Roth's attack hits home, it becomes personal — Roy's Honor is at stake.

By the time Neeson and Roth duel it out in the inevitable but exceedingly well–staged showdown (played with little music, it's a battle between Neeson's honor–forged bruteness and Roth's skillful if unconscionable villainy) Rob Roy has already delivered the goods. What it lacks in finesse it makes up with quiet integrity — though if you're looking for a swift action picture, look elsewhere.

Rob Roy's strength lies in its old–fashioned, corny believability. It's forged best between Neeson and Lange, who merge Golden Age movie romanticism with a wholesome contemporary sensibility. When Neeson and Lange are together on screen there's a sense of their history, and it's less a cynical movie pairing than a truly memorable coupling. Lange is the key here, spending ample screen time picking up after Neeson's honor–drenched ego. She's more than window dressing, and the movie is better for it.

Matching Neeson for sheer presence is Tim Roth, who, despite a number of supporting roles in American and British

Speakers discuss ethnicity

Creation of Asian American studies a priority

By Lisa Chiu
Collegian Correspondent

The Institute for Asian American Studies has been working strong for the past two years at the University of Massachusetts at Boston. Its primary goal is to work on applied research and policy, data collection, advocacy, and to provide five or six courses each semester on Asian American studies.

At the University of California–Berkeley, there is an autonomous independent department in ethnic studies. Students can major in Native American, Latino/a American, Asian American and Afro American studies, as well as comparative ethnic studies. This department has been in existence for 26 years.

News Analysis

Ever since the 1960s, the fight for ethnic studies on college campuses has been one filled with opposition, conflict and contradiction.

On April 11, Peter Kiang, assistant professor at UMass– Boston, spoke to a group of students and faculty on the process through which the Institute for Asian–American Studies at that campus was created. Three days later, Professor Ling-chi Wang from Berkeley spoke on aspects of both ethnic studies in general and Asian–American studies in particular at Amherst College.

Both Kiang and Wang spoke of the necessity of Asian– American studies and ethnic studies. Kiang related the need for Asian–American studies to the recent incidents of hate crimes against Asians in America. One example of the rise in hate crimes was in Stockton, Calif., in 1987, where a White male shot over 100 automatic bullets into a school yard at Cleveland Elementary School. No media reported that this White male aimed at specifically Southeast Asian children. In the aftermath, five Vietnamese and Cambodian children were dead. In the investigation by the district attorney, they found that this man frequently accosted Southeast Asian children, telling them to "Speak English, you're in America now."

Another example was seen a few years later when a 13– year–old Cambodian boy was thrown into a canal in Lowell and drowned to death by an 11–year–old White child — whose father was one of the most vocal supporters of the "pro–English" movement in Lowell.

Wang related the need for Asian–American studies by looking at history. He began with the infamous "Chinese question," the question that asked what the government was to do about the influx of masses of Chinese immigrants into the United States. The Chinese were not indigenous like the Native Americans and could not be eliminated, nor were they enslaved like the African Americans; however, they were still non–White and were used to serve the interests of Whites just like the Native Americans and the African–Americans. The Chinese were stripped of citizenship and were the first immigrant group in the history of the United States to be denied entry.

Wang said, "It is because of these instances in history that cause us to reconceptualize our American identity." Kiang alluded to the fact that if students were taught the experience of Asians in America, they wouldn't be as likely to maintain the stereotypes that surround Asian–Americans, as well as to fall into a deep hatred of minorities, a crucial element responsible for hate crimes.

Wang spoke of how the strongest constituency in the fight for ethnic studies is the students and the communities. The students in the Sixties fought for ethnic studies through the Third World Liberation Front, a diverse group of students that confronted the administration.

Kiang also spoke of the need for community in initiating Asian–American studies. Because UMass–Boston was located in an area where there is a large Asian–American community, it is easier to prove to the university the need to cater to the community. Massachusetts has the second largest Southeast Asian population outside of California. To create the Institute for Asian American Studies, they worked on grassroots fundraising projects from the community as well as lobbying senators at the State House.

Both speakers focused on key areas for initiating both ethnic studies and Asian American studies: the need for an ethnic studies program that would serve specific communities, the need for dedicated students who understand the community, and the need for a common set of principles that students are to adhere to. The universities did not initiate these programs — all ethnic studies programs began thanks to the efforts of the students and the community.

Communities are different in every area, from Boston to California to Amherst. What happened in Berkeley and Boston cannot be replicated in Amherst. Amherst has its own community that students need to understand well. The speakers, students and faculty asked questions on how to initiate an Asian–American studies program in the Pioneer Valley. A Five–College Asian American studies committee was established in 1991, but it died out due to graduating students and lack of funding. Audience members discussed reinitiating the Five–College committee, or establishing them at the individual universities in the valley.

Students expressed concern that the burden of persistence is always placed on the students, and yet at the same time, such programs can only be initiated by the students and the community. "I agree that students need to come together and fight but whenever students graduate or whenever they cannot give one hundred percent of their time on such a large project, the administration and faculty always use it as a way to show that student don't care. When you look at UMass–Boston, they began by hiring someone, to begin with. For students, when social responsibility runs out in favor of passing in your courses, you're labeled as uncaring and lazy. If students don't get the support needed to aid them in the fight for ethnic studies, interest will die out," one student stated.

Regardless of who is at fault, students, faculty or administration, the fact remains that in order to form any sort of ethnic studies program, there must be a consistent and persistent force. "Persistence is the best antidote to bureaucratic delay," Wang said at the end of his lecture. However informative both Kiang and Wang were, without any action in this campus, the end result of the discussion they initiated will just be discourse. In Boston and Berkeley action proved to be everything.

Memoirs of an anti–Semite

Every afternoon after school, all the children in the neighborhood gathered in el parque. As soon as the kid with the soccer ball arrived, two teams were formed and the ritual of the daily fútbol game began.

And although fútbol was played for at least two hours, it was not our only pastime. Sometimes we would decide to venture into buildings under construction, play touch and run with peoples' doorbells, explode firecrackers in empty mailboxes or even try to sneak into the Embassy of the Vatican, a huge mansion next to el parque. The day always ended at a friend's house where some lemonade and cookies would help us discuss our future plans to become cosmonauts, fútbol stars or presidents.

Little did I know then that one day I was to take a plane to Massachusetts to study at the state university. Little did I know that I would become an editor at the university's newspaper. Little did I know that this job would win me the disdain of a group of people. I became an editor at the newspaper hoping to follow on the words of Jose Martí, the great Cuban hero, who was also a journalist: "Liberty is the right of every man to be honest, and to think and talk without hypocrisy. A man that hides what he thinks, or does not dare to say what he thinks, is not an honest man. A man that follows a bad government, without working to better that government, is not an honest man. A man that limits himself to obey unjust laws, and allows other men to step on the country where he was born, is not an honest man." And thus, I began the task of unveiling different perspectives not found in the United States media, namely those of people from developing nations.

Juan José Chacon Quiros

The struggles for freedom and justice led the Developing Nations desk to places like Haiti, Somalia, Mexico, Algeria, Iraq, Peru, Cuba or Palestine. The Developing Nations page gives a voice to people from the Third World to express their views and opinions on the issues taking place in their world. There have been articles strongly criticizing the United States for the invasion of Haiti and Somalia or the blockade on Cuba. At other times the development strategies imposed by international financial institutions on the Third World have become the subject of analysis by writers from Pakistan and Barbados.

However, the moment I allowed to print in the Developing Nations page a different perspective on the Palestinian–Israeli situation, I became an anti-Semite in the eyes of many on this campus. It struck me by surprise, for I had never been accused of such an atrocity. I grew up in Rohrmoser, a neighborhood in San José. Suddenly, I was charged with going against some of my best friends and most people in Rohrmoser, one of the biggest Jewish neighborhoods.

Remembering those years, I realized that in my country we never ask ourselves if someone is Jewish or not before we can play fútbol just like we never ask ourselves if someone is Jewish or not before we engage in any discussion — even if it includes criticizing Israeli foreign policy. Perhaps it's because we are never called anti-Semitic if we decide to be part of such a discussion.

I was deeply bothered by the anti-Semitic label but once again Jose Martí provided me some comfort with his words: "There is no prow that can block a cloud of ideas. An energic idea, flamed in time before the world, will stop, like the mystic flag in Doom's Day, a squadron of battleships." Why should I tell a Palestinian that I could not print her different point of view because it criticized Israel when some of her same ideas were expressed right here on campus by Jewish Israeli speakers like Maxim Ghilan and Israel Shahak? Was I supposed to tell her that only Jewish Israelis can criticize Israel's policies towards Palestine and Palestinians? Quite the opposite, Palestinians should be allowed to express their opinions especially when these opinions can open a debate, therefore contributing to the entire campus community, including the Israelis.

Another example is that of a Guatemalan man who complained that the entire Guatemalan army intelligence was carried out by Israelis as part of an agreement between Israel and the United States. The Guatemalan army has killed hundreds of thousands of indigenous people and decimated the heritage of the Maya civilization. How could I tell this man that he cannot criticize Israel for providing the Guatemalan army with intelligence?

Perhaps very few Jewish Israelis know about this chapter that is well documented, and maybe if they knew they would ask their government to stop these actions in the same fashion a U.S. congressman just asked the Clinton administration to stop providing funds for the Guatemalan army. However, on this campus an issue like this one is taken out of context and dehumanized, and those who brought about the issue are branded anti-Semites without any willingness to constructively participate in a debate. What if the Guatemalan man called you anti-Guatemalan or anti-Mayan for your lack of understanding on this issue?

When the University administration began discussions to enact a policy that could restrict the ability of students to invite speakers and I decided to express my views on this policy, once again it became a sport to call me an anti– Semite. The policy was never enacted although some still hope it will come back to life. Some time later, a tip from a high level administrator and other members of the ALANA community who did not want their names disclosed, led me to include a paragraph in an opinion piece on the increasing influence of outside organizations on the UMass campus. I strongly criticized the Anti–Defamation League (ADL) and some other Jewish organizations for trying to enforce a ban on controversial speakers by examining the composition of student groups that dared to invite such speakers.

Many people reacted to the article by stating that I was implying that there was a conspiracy between Jews and the government — clearly going beyond any of my intentions. I am not afraid to criticize. I have strongly criticized my own government in the past for the treatment it has given to Nicaraguan refugees because I believe that a debate on this issue would ultimately make Costa Rica stronger, more accountable and ultimately more peaceful.

Recently, the Developing Nations desk has once again become an issue for a group of individuals. They have questioned our right to cover events such as the Palestinian Rights Vigil that took place April 8, because they deemed it "not newsworthy." Furthermore they believed "Israel treats Palestinians better than most countries in the world treat their own citizens." They have gone as far as to say that some of the articles written by community members in Amherst are in fact written by Hamas and simultaneously published in cities across the United States.

These individuals should reexamine their own attitudes not only toward Palestinians, but also toward human beings as a whole. Apparently they do not consider important to listen to other people's perspectives and therefore have decided to selfishly live inside a shell where only the opinions they feel comfortable with are welcomed.

There's a very different world out there for you to discover, billions of fellow human beings who can provide you with perspectives you never heard before, cultures you never knew existed: the Third World. Why don't we ask a Palestinian if Israel treats them better than most countries treat their own citizens? Perhaps they may have some startling revelations and you could learn from them.

Fortunately, some members of the Jewish community, including some friends of mine, have expressed their support at times when it seemed very easy for me to make generalizations for the actions of a few.

The Developing Nations page is open to anyone who can provide a different perspective with respect to the Third World that cannot be found in the western media. In the past year, four articles have been published in the page by Jewish people including an Israeli Jew, and the desk is extremely grateful for the quality of their contributions.

Some Jewish people on campus make it a daily task to call me an anti-Semite, when they know very little about me and have never taken the time to engage in a conversation about these issues. Recently I went back home and visited el parque. Most of my friends are adults now. After listening to my story they made an extremely important statement for me: "Make no mistake Juan José," Lenny said, "we know who you are. You are going to live in Costa Rica after you graduate; let the Gringos think what they want but do not worry. We know better than anyone that you are not an anti-Semite." And I am not an anti-Semite. I believe that anyone should be allowed to express their views, especially when they can contribute to our understanding of the world. I am honest. I will not hide what I think. I talk without hypocrisy. I am a free man.

I am happy to know that the people I care about, the people I love, not only know the truth about me but will respect my right to a different set of opinions by debating issues instead of branding me an anti-Semite. The fact that this article is needed reminds of a story by Costa Rican writer Quince Duncan. In this, the mother's last words before her son leaves the house forever were: "There are two roads, son; only two: the road of mire where one vegetates and dies, and the road of glory that is a constant struggle. You choose."

Are Latin Americans a race?

Recently, in a conversation with an Angolan and a Jamaican con ..ning the finer virtues of fútbol, I mockingly said, "Dominicans can't play soccer if they do baseball." A friend told me, "That's a racist comment!" While I took it as a joke, that comment reminded me of why I despise the ideological essentialism which s a l a d–bowled A m e r i c a n s (including some hyphenated Americans) use to describe the world outside of their relatively privileged nation, namely the theory that nations can be equal to races or ethnicities.

Charles "El Pirata" Venator Santiago

There is no doubt in my mind that many Puerto Ricans despise, hate and do not respect people from the Dominican Republic, as well as Haitians or Cubans. No doubt most of it is due to the subordination of African (Black) identities to Spanish (White) ones, and perhaps some class overtones. What I find more problematic is the assimilation of a nation, less than 200 years old, with an essentialist label that ignores the diversity within the nation. This is dangerous — if Proposition 187, Nazi Germany, or the former Yugoslavia aren't clear enough examples, then I don't know what are.

Nations are arbitrary communal constructions which use artificial boundaries to define their contents and regulate the flow of people, capital and symbols. To say that Latino/a is are a race is to ignore the diversity of experiences that the people, nations, the oppressed, have lived. To celebrate 500 years of Spanish heritage is to ignore the suffering, exploitation and barbarism to which many of the good old Christian Spanish subjected the Tainos, Aztecas, Incas, Mayas, Africans and other peoples. To claim that Puerto Ricans is a race is to arbitrarily homogenize a variety of communities and peoples into one scientific category.

Further, to say Latin Americans are of one race is to neglect Toussaint L'Ouverture, Quetzalcoatl, Ché Guevara, Don Pedro Albizu Campos, Enriquillo, and multiple other historical figures with diverse ideological ambitions. To say we are of one ethnic category denies the differences of our mutually (re)constituting identities. Race places a universal label which overlooks our history, our past and present struggles, our fluid and changing differentiations. This is not only deceptive, it is pretentious, oppressive and alienating.

So what is left? Perhaps we should simply open discourse to the marginalized and stigmatized voices, and stop privileging the so-called experts who rewrite liberal explanations of who we are supposed to be, grounding themselves on traditional Western sources of cumulative knowledge. Perhaps when speaking about Latin America we need to start looking at how our identities are implicated in what we are preaching.

A time for immanent unity

A few days ago my girlfriend made me realize that I am not really Dominican, and that she isn't Peruvian. I was born in the Dominican Republic and my girlfriend's parents are from Perú. If I was to call myself Dominican, I would be denying part of what I am, and the same holds true for her. I am a mix because I have been influenced by other cultures in the United States.

What am I? I am Latino. This does not mean that I am forgetting my land of birth, but when I travel back there I realize that I am no longer exactly like them. We have a different perception and ideology of self. My girlfriend tells me that she has similar feelings about Perú, and even other Latino/a's share such sentiments.

Sonny Rivas

To be sure, we are not all the same. If we look at our heritage, we see that most Latinos have gone through analogous precedents: Spanish or Portuguese imposed colonization, slavery and maltreatment of indigenous peoples. We don't all look the same because in the Caribbean most of the indigenous people were killed. In Perú and Ecuador the slaves died due to forced labor at high altitudes, as happened in Mexico. Our surrounding environments make us different.

When Latinos from different backgrounds talk about their native lands, they begin to find that through their differences, they actually reach many commonalities. When Latinos get to the United States and assimilate into the general American culture, they intermingle with other Latinos, the result being of a diversity within the Latino community — making all Latinos more and more alike. I adopt my girlfriend's culture, my other friends' cultures, my teacher's culture; in fact, with anyone else I come in contact with. We are now jumping the same hurdles — thus, let us not try to trip each other.

I ask that all Latinos realize that we will never succeed if we don't get together. Let's delete those petty differences and become one in fighting for justice and progression within our community. We should not stand for the abuse of our Latino brothers who work in the Campus Center! We should not stand for the lack of an authentic Latin American Studies department!

We should not stand the fact that we don't have a Latino House (I would personally like to see a Casa Bolivar) or that we don't have enough space for our RSO's! We must unite — for when it all comes down to it we are all from Mexico, Chile, Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay, Perú, Bolivia, Venezuela, Colombia, Costa Rica, Panamá, Honduras, Guatemala, El Salvador, Cuba, República Dominicana, Haiti, Puerto Rico and Nicaragua. So, to answer once again to the question, what am I, I tell you: I am Latino first, Dominican second, Black third and then Human.

Foreign Language Day comes to UM

High schools get chance to partake in international issues

By Russell Edgar
Special to the Collegian

Over 200 talented high school students and teachers came to campus last week from high schools throughout the state of Massachusetts to participate in the annual Foreign Language Day.

High school teachers visited language classes, were given a tour of the Foreign Language Resource Center and had lunch with faculty, as well as participating in various panel discussions.

Foreign Language Day provided an opportunity for high school students and teachers to gain an appreciation for the varied foreign language opportunities offered at the University of Massachusetts, said Thérèse Pasquale, associate director of Residential Academic Programs.

The students sat in on various language classes, ate lunch together at the dining commons and participated in special presentations offered by various departments related to foreign language learning on campus.

The keynote event for the whole day was a joint presentation offered by International Programs and Residential Academic Programs. Former study abroad students addressed the audience of high school students about the advantages of spending a semester or year abroad during their college career.

One of the points brought up was that knowing a foreign language can have a huge impact on their futures, academically, professionally and personally.

The students heard of the many opportunities UMass offers to study foreign languages abroad, including programs in Latin America, Asia, Africa and Europe. The students were informed that in many cases they can earn credits towards their majors, minors or general University requirements while abroad, in addition to gaining fluency in a foreign language.

Also, students were reminded that financial aid does apply to most study abroad programs. Additionally, a small number of travel scholarships are available for students.

Pasquale then spoke to the group about the foreign language suites and the new International House. She said that the four language suites (French, German, Japanese and Spanish) will be moved after this semester to become part of the new Thatcher International House in the Northeast Residential Area. Several current language suite members also shared their personal experiences and answered relevant questions from the audience.

The language suites had been located at Brown House in the Sylvan area since 1986. However, several problems arose with different kinds of cultural events that language suite participants held. Such events often conflicted with "the comings and goings of the other, non–language students there," according to Pasquale.

The new setting for foreign language suites in Thatcher House will provide an expansion of resources available to students. For example, each of the language programs will have a respective classroom.

"The move to Thatcher House enables us to really use the space students live in as a living [and] learning center. [Students will] have a place to get together with faculty after hours. They'll have a place to prepare international meals, to hold cultural events, to host other people from other countries who come to UMass to give a talk," Pasquale said.

According to Pasquale, students interested in partaking in this experience do not need to be majoring in foreign languages. "Many of our students have majored in business management or political science and want to add foreign language ability to their main area of interest," she said.

For more information on foreign language programs in the new Thatcher International House, contact Thérèse Pasquale at 545–2882. For further information on studying abroad through International Programs, contact Pat Vokbus at 545–2843.

shows, and finds it difficult to conceive of them harnessing all that energy in the clinical confines of the recording studio, should think again! The band let the studio adjust to them and their jam–honed sensibilities rule the day.

The opener "Backwards Man" slides along on a silken groove easing one softly into the album. "Blue Line" is Allmans' influenced Southern–fried boogie with vocalist Jason Bain scatting the blues over the top. "Existential Blues (My Way Out)" locks in on a jazzy groove as the band takes us through a whirlwind of paranoia, pressure and breakups. "Days of Leisure" is Synaesthesia's most radio–friendly cut and is reminiscent of Blind Melon's "Tones of Home," without Shannon's Perry Farrell imitation.

"Little" closes the first side and is a drifting lament driven by Brendan O'Reilly's hushed keyboard, building to a crescendo as the band slips in a soft lullaby refrain. The second side of the album is another matter, the band attempting a "Mountain Jam" for the Nineties. Sit back, turn the lights down low, choose your poison and let Synaesthesia massage your senses. "Good Things Come In Threes" is the sort of ambitious instrumental epic which only the sharpest musos could pull off and the band do just that. A funkin' great debut. A– (Gareth Curtis)

Journalist leaves CNN for talk radio

By Jim Salter
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Charles Jaco has dodged Scud missiles in the Persian Gulf, wrestled with Manuel Noriega's thugs in Panama and tracked the famine in Africa.

But after a bitter parting of the ways with CNN last year, the former globe-hopping correspondent has settled into a mid-afternoon news-talk show slot at AM radio powerhouse KMOX.

A comedown? Hardly, Jaco says.

"I figure two hours a day to do essentially whatever you want within the realm of journalism — kind of bringing the world to St. Louis' doorstep — is a kick for me. I love it," he says.

And he has no regrets about leaving CNN, which, he admits, wasn't by choice.

"They called me into my bureau chief's office and said, 'Congratulations for your work — you're fired,'" Jaco said. "They said, 'You have five hours to clear your desk out.' They never told me why.

"It doesn't matter anymore. It was like a 10,000-pound weight off my shoulders because CNN, for all its public image as a news organization people trust, is a miserable place to work."

Ed Turner, vice president for news at CNN, won't discuss Jaco's firing. Told Jaco was critical of CNN management, he said: "I'm not surprised. I'll let him say what he says. I wish him well."

Jaco's new show, "KMOX Newsmakers With Charles Jaco," debuted in February.

"I had been on the lookout for somebody that would represent world experience, credibility, somebody who could really be a statesman for KMOX," said Tom Langmyer, the station's program director.

Jaco says the timing was right for a move back to his home state. Recently married for the third time, he says he was ready to settle down.

Jaco, 44, grew up in southeast Missouri and studied journalism at Columbia University. His first job was as news director of Chicago FM rock station WXRT, and he soon moved on to NBC Radio.

"In the summer of '85, I said, 'Look, give me $10,000 and a tape recorder and three months. I'm going to Africa and I'll give you stuff you haven't thought of yet.'"

The taste of world travel hooked him. By 1988, he had moved on to television and CNN. He'd just been rotated into Saudi Arabia when the Persian Gulf War began in 1991.

Though the war lasted less than eight weeks, it made Jaco a household name.

"The idea was, go live while all this stuff is going on around you and try to put on the appearance of keeping your composure," he said. "Those were our orders. We had no idea the effect we were having."

It wasn't until Jaco started getting cardboard boxes filled with mail from the United States that he was aware of his newfound celebrity.

His fan base extended beyond the United States. His reports provided hard-to-come-by information to the Saudis, for whom he became something of a hero. An Iraqi battle flag and saber — gifts from Saudis — adorn the walls of his small, windowless office in the KMOX building.

Extravaganja features bands, activists, fun

By Rob Stevens

EXTRAVAGANJA
Campus pond
April 15

This Saturday the annual Extravaganja passed through the University of Massachusetts. Between the library and the campus pond, ganja was glorified and the public showed its approval with applause.

Several local bands played and hundreds of people gathered to show their support for the "world's greatest plant." Like any other rally, Extravaganja had its purpose and its place, but fun was to be had by all.

The day opened with a most beautiful surprise: Synaesthesia opening up the day, unannounced. They had the dubious task of breaking the ice. The band kept jammed and soon enough had the crowd grooving.

Once the crowd was relaxed, the rest of the day sailed smoothly and merrily with performances from several other bands. Cameron's Way put on a great show, playing hard and loud over the audience's buzz. Other bands performing were Soup, Rippopotamus and Herbal Remedy. Every band played raw, care-free and funky, keeping the attendants pleased and in a mellow mood all day.

But music wasn't the only thing going on at the festival. Various tables sold such items as stickers, T-shirts and necklaces and passed out pamphlets and a plethora of pro-ganja products. In between bands, advocates of marijuana legalization spoke. Just like the bands, these speakers put their hearts behind their words and discussed the actions that must be taken to make the plant more accepted.

Some of the speakers came down on the government, arguing that the Republicans were causing a "black market" and have too much control over private life. Others felt that too much money is spent in America trying to prevent drugs and that if the laws against drugs were softened, the government could actually make money.

Besides the politics of their plea, the speakers were there to make pot smokers feel good about what they smoke. The basic message: people who smoke the herb are normal people too, they don't harm anyone.

The final band, The Black Rebels, were the act most people were waiting for. The reggae band put on an excellent performance, captivating the crowd with their melodic beats and soothing all who lent an ear. A spirit of Rastafari truly emerged in the air and between everyone.

Rebecca Walker to talk on new Feminist Wave

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Activist and writer Rebecca Walker will speak tonight about feminism and where the feminist movement is going in her lecture entitled "The Third Wave of Feminism."

Walker is the founder of the Third Wave Direct-Action Corporation, a non-profit organization advocating youth activism and social change.

The Third Wave organized Freedom Summer '92, a program which registered 20,000 inner-city voters.

In a press release, Walker said personal and political activism leads to empowerment.

"I believe that economic and political equality for women, and freedom from sexual violence, are the first steps toward a more just and humane society. Each and every one of us should be committed to ensuring these basic rights for all," she said.

A Yale graduate, Walker travels to colleges and high schools motivating youth to political activism. She encourages audiences to begin their own branches of The Third Wave.

The contributing editor at Ms. magazine said she became active because she is a product of the civil rights and feminist movements, but felt discouraged by the weakening of civil rights legislation.

"Facing the reality that we will all need something to right our world gone wrong, I felt I could not afford to turn my back on the issues I care about," she said.

Walker is being brought by the Distinguished Visitors Program. The program has brought speakers such as Cornell West, Richard Linklater, Gloria Anzaldua and Kurt Vonnegut in the past.

The lecture will be tonight at 8 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. Admission is free for UMass students with a valid ID and $2 for the general public.

Study examines local wildlife refuge

By Scott Martin
Collegian Correspondent

Where wildlife is in dire need of protection, the University of Massachusetts is attempting to come to the rescue.

The UMass resource economics department is conducting a study that could ultimately serve to protect wildlife and scarce resources, according to David Storey, professor of resource economics.

The department will assist by conducting a study that would determine the impact of the proposed Silvio O. Conte National Fish and Wildlife Refuge in the Connecticut River basin.

The Conte Refuge would consist of some lands to protect rare species and other lands open to the public for recreation and tourism, Stevens said.

"If nothing is done to protect the environment in the Connecticut River Valley," Stevens said, "there will be a continual decline in biodiversity and the number of species throughout the region.

"By decreasing biodiversity we may lose potential medicines, we could lose the cure for cancer."

Stevens said the Pioneer Valley environment would become more fragile, and the effects would be seen in the climate and in wildlife.

The Connecticut river basin has already suffered from a decrease in species. The Atlantic salmon is a species that is close to endangered in the river basin, said Stevens.

The study is being supported by federal appropriations from Congress. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service chose to work with the UMass resource economics department on the project, Stevens said.

"We are the only university in the valley that deals directly with evaluation of wildlife," he said. "UMass has expertise in this area that no one else in the region has."

When the study is completed, the results will be sent to Congress.

The project uses an innovative approach by combining the refuge's economic impact with a detailed look at its "non- use" values.

Non-use values are those placed on the region's resources by people who would not necessarily use the refuge directly. "I may not want to see a grizzly bear," Stevens said, "but I'd be willing to pay taxes to protect their habitat, because I believe they have a right to exist."

In the past many similar studies focused entirely on the economic affects.

Stevens and Storey began directing the economic portion of the study in June 1994. They are researching the impact on tax revenues to local governments, employment, recreation and tourism. This economic portion is expected to be completed in April.

Three undergraduate students were hired last summer to collect information and a graduate student is writing a thesis on the project.

"The students are doing the lion's share of the work," Stevens said.

A bill must be passed to allow for the allocation of funds to create the Silvio O. Conte Refuge. Stevens said that with the current climate of budget cuts and slashed spending in Congress, future funding for the refuge is uncertain.

"We're not optimistic," he said.

Will Flint, a senior economics major, has been working on the study since January. His role is to send out surveys and when returned, he must tabulate the results.

"It will be interesting to see how it unfolds," Flint said. "It's important to at least maintain levels. If we neglect the region, it's going to get worse."

RELATIONS continued from page 1

"I think there's been a real misconception why Hillel resents the bringing of these speakers," Ben-Harav said. "The issue is not that they're Black speakers. The issue is that they're anti-Semitic speakers."

The two communities have different beliefs on the focus of the speakers invited to campus.

Shamapande said the speakers have a positive impact on the Black community, and that the idea is not to injure anyone. Ben-Harav said it was important to pay attention to Black empowerment, but a factor that is neglected is that the "message comes in a package. Part of the package is anti- Semitism, which is unnecessary."

Group dynamics

It can be said much of the tension occurs between the two groups representing the students, as opposed to the average student on campus.

While general members of the UMass community may be upset at the uproar surrounding the arrival of a speaker, it seems the majority of the tension is between groups such as Hillel, BSU and Phi Beta Sigma, the Black fraternity that has sponsored many of the controversial lecturers.

Shamapande suggested that both sides are "reacting to a history of oppression," a sentiment indicating that perhaps attitudes need to change.

"[Hillel has] no anti-Black feelings," Ben-Harav said. "We attempt to work with Black groups and bring Black speakers."

In the aftermath of such events as the Black athlete GPA scandal and the racist remark in the dining hall earlier this semester, in addition to the furor over certain speakers, Shamapande said that there exists "a feeling of being beseiged as a community," but that Black affiliations do not direct frustration towards their Jewish counterparts.

"It knows no religious grounds," he said. "It includes the Jewish community, but they are not singled out."

The problem at large, according to Shamapande, may be that the youth in power on campus are trying to tackle worldly problems, and their inexperience shows.

"Each community has young leaders drawing lines where no lines need to be drawn," Shamapande said.

Defending champs repeat in Boston

By Bert Rosenthal
Associated Press

BOSTON — Uta Pippig won the women's division of the 99th Boston Marathon today, and Cosmas Ndeti won for the men, making this the first time that defending champions in both divisions have won the race.

But despite running far ahead of their closest challengers, Pippig and Ndeti were unable to beat the course records they set last year.

Pippig, 29, of Germany blew kisses to the crowd as she crossed the finish line with an official time of 2:25:12, about four minutes over her record-breaker. Ndeti, 25, of Kenya won the men's division for the third straight year with an official time of 2:09:22 — two minutes over his best.

"It was such a great race. It was a little bit warm. It was nice," said Pippig after the race. "I had a little bit of a blister on my feet, but that's the marathoner's problem sometimes."

Ndeti noted today was the birthday of his son Gideon Boston, named in honor of his winning the race in 1993. Last year, Ndeti set the course record of 2:07:15.

This year, his countryman Moses Tanui finished second with a time of 2:10:22. In third place was Luiz Antonio Dos Santos of Brazil.

For the women, Elana Meyer of South Africa, finished second. Meyer had followed Pippig closely but fell behind and appeared to be limping at the 22-mile mark.

Meyer and Tegla Loroupe, of Kenya, lost about 40 yards at the 20-mile mark when they tried to pick up water bottles and ran into each other.

In the wheelchair division, Jean Driscoll tallied her sixth straight win for the women, and Franz Nietlispach of Switzerland was the wheelchair winner for the men.

Driscoll, 28, won with a time of 1:40:41, about six minutes behind her winning time last year. Nietlispach, 37, crossed the finish line well ahead of the wheelchair pack with an unofficial time of 1:25:59.

Of 12,000 runners, 9,410 were entered officially in the race. The 7,233 men and 2,177 women came from all of the United States and 74 foreign countries. Another 3,000 unofficial entrants were expected.

As the marathon started in Hopkinton at noon, officials scrambled to block off a hole in the course left by a water main break two miles from the finish line.

The course had been cleared of water after a 12-inch pipe burst early this morning at the 24-mile mark in Brookline. But the crowds prevented the public works department from repairing the 10-foot-wide hole, so about 30 feet of the course was narrowed from three lanes to 1 1/2.

While today's race was filled with elite competitors from throughout the world, Linda Somers, the first marathoner to qualify for next year's U.S. Olympic trials, was the only world-class American —man or woman — among the entries.

But she had no illusions about winning. Not against a field that included Pippig, 1994 New York City Marathon champion Loroupe and the Nos. 2-3-5 finishers at Boston last year — Valentina Yegorova of Russia, Meyer, and Carmen de Oliveira of Brazil.

David Cahill, Tutt and Terry O'Neil took the top three places for the Minutemen.

In all, the Minutemen won 12 of the 18 total events in the competition Saturday, including sophomore John Way in the steeplechase (9:45.2), junior Robert Dalton in throwing the hammer (155–6) and Ryan Lambert tossing the javelin (181–7).

The Minutemen will travel down I–90 to Worcester where they will compete in the Holy Cross Invitational next Saturday.

time by Martens (1–for–1). Cardenas then scored on a Buckley (1–for–3, one RBI) single to give the Minutewomen a 1–0 lead. But from that point, the Minutewomen bats went cold as they could not muster another run for the game.

The scored remained 1–1 after six full innings with the help of some fine defensive plays by the Minutewomen defense. Gutridge made a spectacular fully-extended diving catch on a short pop–up in the third inning while Dorsey nailed a runner at the plate trying to score with a perfect throw in the top of the fifth.

Rutgers broke the tie in the top of the seventh when three Lady Knight runners crossed home plate. Maureen Lee got the big hit of the inning smashing a triple to knock in a run.

Ortega took the loss for UMass. In six and one–third innings pitched the sophomore gave up seven hits, four runs (three of them earned), struck out four and walked one. Daut pitched the last two–thirds of the game and struck out one.

over, scoring four of his five in the second half.

For the second year in a row, Delaware put a dent in Massachusetts' postseason hopes. The remaining games against New England teams become even more important, because the New England champion has traditionally made the tournament. But Cannella believes that the team needs to win out to ensure themselves a bid.

"Now we have to go 6–0," Cannella said.

"It's a heartbreaker," said senior co–captain Jared Lanning. "It gives us no room to screw up the rest of the season."

The Minutemen return to action on Wednesday, when they take on New England rival Harvard in Cambridge.

Game notes: Mike Valente moved into a tie (with Fred Menna) for seventh place on the UMass career assist list with 78 ... Freshman Tim Murphy, who had not played this season, has left the Minuteman squad.

crease, his shot went wide left past a net vacated by his textbook fake.

Though Brad Glowaki capped the scoring at 11:10 of the fourth, UMass squandered three great 11th hour chances. Valente set up Bailey on Cooper's right but he shot wide. Then Costello hit Glass at the goalmouth with a behind the back pass, but Glass couldn't convert. And after calling UMass' last timeout with 39 seconds left, Chris Grande turned it over before he could take the shot designated for him in Cannella's strategy.

and 16 assists), and scoring at least three points in seven contests. Right behind Lubertazzi is another senior, as Melissa Compton has scored in every game for the team this year (23 goals, 6 assists).

For MacNeil, the team has to take advantage of their practice time to get up for this opponent, who they match up well with.

"I think Hofstra is going to look a lot like Rutgers," MacNeil said. "With our practice on Monday, we are going to have to work on our intensity and game plan.

"We did it against Dartmouth, now we have to do it against teams we are evenly matched with. We have to pull up our intensity, and believe in ourselves.

"Those two things are really big, and we are going to need both of them."

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Freshman Kristin Kramer (21) and the Massachusetts women's lacrosse offense were shut down by Rutgers Saturday, losing 6–4.

Women's lacrosse loses to Rutgers

Minutewomen suffer two-goal loss to Lady Knights

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Buoyed by a second half comeback bid, the University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (2–6) was unable to make up a 6–1 deficit, losing to Rutgers Saturday, 6–4.

According to senior captain Diane MacNeil, the total team effort against No. 4 nationally ranked Dartmouth last Wednesday on the road was not there at Totman Field.

"Our lack of intensity really bothered me," MacNeil said. "Sometimes in practice we are not practicing intense, and it shows. Against Dartmouth, we did really well against a ranked team.

"Then, against an unranked team who we are evenly matched against at home, we failed to follow our game plan which really fell apart."

Through the course of the game the play degenerated into hard fouls by Rutgers, and talking resulted on both sides. The stellar goaltending of Rutgers' freshman Paula Chamoun was what won the game for the Lady Knights, not the continuous defensive hacking by her teammates, as she compiled 20 saves in the win.

The opening tip was won by UMass freshman midfielder Cindy O'Brien (2 goals), and from there the team controlled the ball for the majority of the first half.

Even though sophomore midfielder Brandi Bailey (4 goals) of Rutgers scored at 27:34, the offense was working the perimeter, but was just missing out on their scoring opportunities.

The passing for the Minutewomen was off most of the period, and quality opportunities by sophomore attacker Sarah Goddard (5 goals this season) and freshman midfielder Vicky Nedomansky (7 goals this season) were not capitalized upon.

The relentless, hard defensive style of the Lady Knights appeared to frustrate UMass as the half went on, forcing them to take bad shots. The Minutewomen started to get out of their game plan of controlled offense and passing, and with 1:16 left, Rutgers ran off two goals to make it 3–1 at the break.

"Once we got down [to the offensive zone], we did not execute our plays," MacNeil said. "I do not think that the defense did a great job on transition defense, there were way too many turnovers and those have been killing us.

"We wait for a team to come to us sometimes, and then think 'now we got ourselves in a hole, let's fight back,' instead of going out gangbusters and making them chase us."

The first 10 minutes in the second half became a nightmare for the Minutewomen, as the Lady Knights came out with the offensive intensity. They scored three unanswered goals to make the score 6–1.

Led by freshman leading scorer Joanna Dignazio's two goals (15 goals on the season) and a 14–7 shot advantage, the Minutewomen attempted a comeback, but to no avail.

With 13:09 left in the game, the Lady Knights passed the ball from end to end, taking the remainder of the time off the clock for the win.

The Minutewomen will be looking to get back on the winning track, as they face the Flying Dutchwomen of Hofstra University (5-5) at 4 p.m. today at Totman Field. This will be a test for UMass, as Hofstra coach Carie Bodo has all 11 starters returning from last year's 8–6 squad.

Both teams have similar results against the same teams this season. Hofstra's losses against Brown (15–9), Yale (11–8), Temple (17–6) and Villanova (12–11) go hand in hand with UMass' results against those teams.

Unbeaten men's track tops field by 100

In their last home meet of the season, the University of Massachusetts men's track team scorched a windy and cold Llewelyn Derby track to a 100-point victory. The Minutemen used their team depth to raise their overall record to 8–0–1.

The competition lacked the top–to–bottom dominance on each of the opponents' rosters, as UMass finished the meet with 155 points followed by Holy Cross (54), Central Connecticut (40), Providence (34) and Hartford (2).

The Minutemen's team depth can be shown in comparing their last two meets. In the Boston College–Boston University meet, they used the field events as the springboard to victory. This time, it was the sprinters who ran like wildfire all over their competition.

The Minutemen sprinters took all first place finishes and scored 52 of a possible 64 points in the sprinting events and then swept both the 4x100 and 4x400 relays by extensive margins.

"We knew going in that Providence was going to take a lot of the distance events," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "They have a nationally–ranked distance team, so we had to get points from other sources, and we did that today."

Senior Lyonel Benjamin raced to the finish line first in the 100–meter dash in a time of 10.8 seconds. He was followed by teammates John Johnson (10.9), Christian Abbott (11.0) and Jeremy Menard (11.3) to all but sweep the event. The 200–meter dash showcased four different Minutemen with the same result. Scott Price (22.6), Ron Howerton (22.7), Michael Tessicini (23.2) and Ron Tauro (23.3) ran 1–4, respectively.

Returning from a bad back, freshman Chris Conner showed no signs of pain as he sped to victory in the 400- meter in a time of 51.2. Following Conner over the finish line was Corey Cameron, who took third place.

The Minutemen were equally effective in the hurdling events as Ron Tauro and Brandon Tutt finished 1–2 in the 100–meter high hurdles. As for the 400 hurdles,

John Johnson captured the long jump with a leap of 22– 31/2, and finished second in the 100–meter. He also ran a leg on the victorious 4x100m relay team.

•The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team did not have enough offensive firepower to take Rutgers Saturday. Down 6–1 early in the contest, the Minutewomen attempted a comeback but came up short against the Lady Knights, 6–4 (See page 12).

Men's lacrosse edged by Blue Hens again

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Brendan Glass scored three goals Saturday, his second consecutive hat trick. But it was not enough for the Minutemen, as they were upset by Delaware, 16–15.

Down by a goal with under a minute left in the game, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team attacked furiously but couldn't get a shot past Delaware goalie Brian Cooper as the Blue Hens held on to upset the Minutemen 16–15 at Richard F. Garber Field Saturday.

The Blue Hens led through most of the fourth quarter, but with 4:28 remaining Jeremy Murphy converted a Buddy Hoffman feed to knot the game at 15–15.

The Hens responded, as they had all game long. With 3:50 remaining, Pat Gately (four goals) slung a shot past UMass goalie John Kasselakis that proved to be the game–winner.

Inconsistent goaltending plagued UMass (3–3) throughout. Tom LoPresti showed signs of rust after missing over a week with a hamstring injury. Kasselakis replaced LoPresti twice but had trouble as well. Blue Hen goaltender Cooper was shaky at times, but made 15 saves, including several at crucial junctures.

"I took Tommy out in the third quarter. I thought he wasn't really on his game," Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella said. "I thought throwing John [Kasselakis] in would help us."

The Minuteman defense was solid against Anthony DiMarzo, as Vin Dello–Iacono held the nation's second– leading scorer to only one goal in the contest. The rest of the Blue Hen offense stepped up, however. Concord native Brad Glowaki led Delaware, scoring five goals on his 22nd birthday.

"It feels great," Glowaki said. "I always get pumped up to play UMass. That's the team on the calendar I always want to beat."

Cannella was disappointed in the uncharacteristic performance of his defense.

"You talk about defense all year, and then you don't come ready to play defense," said Cannella, who praised the play of the Blue Hens. "Delaware played a hell of a game today. You got to give them credit."

Murphy had his best offensive day of his career, scoring five goals. Brendan Glass also added three.

The Blue Hens got on the board first, as Gately beat LoPresti to put Delaware ahead 1–0 less than two minutes into the game.

Massachusetts then took over, as Murphy tied it two minutes later. Long–stick midfielder Dennis Kelly scored his first goal of the season as his shot in transition caromed off a Blue Hen defender past Cooper to put the Minutemen ahead 2–1.

From there it appeared that Massachusetts would win the game easily as the home team extended its lead to 7–2, highlighted by Mike Valente's behind–the–head goal while he was being hit.

The Blue Hens didn't give up, however, and stormed back with five unanswered goals to tie the game at seven, with 3:43 remaining in the half.

"We're a never–say–die team," Glowaki said. "We've been down by more than that and come back. We get ourselves into a hole and kick it into gear."

With 27 seconds remaining, Eric Bailey put the Minutemen ahead going into intermission on a pass from Valente.

Bailey got things off on the right foot in the second half, as he redirected a Glass pass by Cooper to give UMass a 9–7 lead.

It went downhill from there for Cannella's squad, as Glowaki took lead.

Delaware, too, counted on some clutch offense to come back, but the Minuteman attack kept firing blanks.

There was some highlight film material, such as Mike Valente's over the shoulder pea that put UMass ahead 6–1 just 22 ticks into the second quarter.

But it's the misses that UMass should remember, mistakes it must not make again in its remaining six games, which Cannella believes UMass must sweep to reach the NCAAs.

Glass recorded his fourth straight three–goal game, but his breakaway misfire in the first minute foreshadowed more crucial errors.

The UMass extra man unit of Glass, Valente, Eric Bailey, Casey Costello, Buddy Hoffman and Jeremy Murphy has connected at a respectable clip (7 of 31, 22.6 percent), and it rarely appears out of sync. Seeking to halt Delaware's game– tying, 5–0 run late in the first half, Hoffman hastily hoisted a shot far wide on an extra man opportunity that had Cannella up in arms. It wasn't a tragic flaw, as Bailey scored on the same opportunity, but it hinted that UMass lacked coherence.

Again from the extra man offense at 10:54 of the third quarter, Valente fed a gorgeous over–the–net pass to Glass, who only had to tuck it away as he's done 51 times in his young career. He missed, failing to cut into Delaware's 12– 10 lead, as large as any it had all day.

Glass had a chance to tie it 12–12 in the waning moments of the third, and he may never miss this shot again. UMass had called timeout at 14:26, and Glass found himself right on the doorstep at 14:43. Perhaps stunned by the ease of his advance into Cooper's

Gorillas score 15 goals but come up one short

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

File the No. 10 University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's 16–15 loss to Delaware Saturday under Games UMass Should Have Won. But don't try to be too exact in affixing the blame for this upset that jeopardizes UMass' NCAA tournament status.

Coach Greg Cannella pointed the finger at his defense, which had played as well as any team's through five games, for the setback. The rearguard had a sub–par afternoon, to be sure, but the same applied to the offense, which has raised its own standards by repeatedly surpassing expectations.

"We talk about defense all year, then you don't come ready to play defense," Cannella said. "We scored 15 goals. You score 15 goals in a game you should win."

Cannella won't get an argument, but what of the blown chances that he and his team will see in their sleep? UMass should have scored more than 15, which would have compensated for the defensive lapse.

The Minutemen entered the season somewhat uncertain of where goals would come from. But last year's top marksman, sophomore Brendan Glass (33 goals in 1994), has endured nothing resembling the slump that often plagues members of his class. Glass is averaging a hat trick per contest and the team has outscored opponents 77–52.

In its 19–5 pasting of New Hampshire, admittedly an inferior squad, UMass fired 39 shots on goal and almost everyone who stepped on the field scored. The Wildcats got an admirable performance from goalie Steve Geisler (20 saves), but that's not what Brian Cooper provided the Blue Hens. Early in Saturday's game, Cooper's five hole was like an extra net as UMass sped to a 7–2

UM win streak comes to an end

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

A loss for the University of Massachusetts baseball team this season has been as rare as a triple–header on the diamond, yet the Minutemen ran into both last Saturday against Duquesne University in Pittsburgh, Pa.

The Dukes' (12–24, 5–12 Atlantic 10) pitching staff stifled a Massachusetts offense that had tortured opposing hurlers recently, holding the Minutemen (17–8, 11–3 A–10) to only one run in their two losses. Despite the setbacks, Massachusetts remains in first place in the conference standings.

Senior right–hander Jay Murphy (4–2) picked up the only victory for the Minutemen on the weekend, tossing a five–hit complete game in the series opener.

Massachusetts got on the board in the third inning when designated hitter Nelson Ubaldo doubled and scored on a two–out single by left–fielder Ryan Jette, giving the Minutemen a 1–0 lead. Duquesne tied the game at 1–1 in the fourth inning, before the Minutemen took control in the top of the seventh.

Four Massachusetts batters drew consecutive walks, and, with the bases loaded, senior catcher Andy Pelis knocked in two runs with a double. Duquesne's Damien Dubien was saddled with the loss, dropping his record to 2–6.

Two streaks ended for the Minutemen in the second game. Massachusetts had its winning streak snapped at 17, while Jette had his hitting streak stopped at 18 straight games.

Massachusetts struck first in the third inning, scoring a run to take a 1–0 lead. Freshman second baseman Muchie Dagliere, who returned after missing over a week of action due to a thigh injury, singled and scored on an RBI double by junior shortstop Mark Pileski.

That would be all for the Minutemen, though, as hurler Dan Lisac shut down Massachusetts for his second win of the season. Duquesne gave Lisac all the run support he needed in the bottom of the fourth, scoring three runs off of Massachusetts starter Chad Paronto (3–2).

Freshman Scott Barnsby and sophomore Steve Levy combined to walk nine Duke batters, yielding five runs on six hits. Barnsby picked up the loss.

The Minutemen return to action today at Earl Lorden Field to face Central Connecticut State at 3 p.m., the start of an eight–day, eight–game homestand for Massachusetts.

Softball splits with Rutgers; beats Hawks

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

The hitting streaks of Sam Cardenas and Kim Guitridge continued as the University of Massachusetts softball team went 2–1 over the long weekend.

Cardenas extended her hitting streak to 21 games, the second longest in UMass history behind only Barb Marean, who hit in 27 straight games during the 1992 season, while Gutridge extended her streak to 13 games.

On Friday, the Minutewomen split a doubleheader with Atlantic 10 rival Rutgers 10–0, 1–4, while yesterday they defeated New England foe Hartford, 6–1, to complete the doubleheader which began on April 6 but was postponed due to inclement weather. UMass' record now stands at 22–13 overall, 7–1 in the A–10.

Massachusetts 6, Hartford 1

Kelly Daut (15–5) picked up her eighth straight victory in leading the Minutewomen over the Hawks. In six innings pitched, Daut allowed one run and struck out three while giving up three hits. Dani Ortega pitched the seventh.

The score was tied at 1–1 after two full innings of play. UMass got another run in the top of the third inning and then got two runs in each of the fifth and sixth innings.

Chris Martens started things off in the top of the fifth with a one out double to right field and Kelly Buckley (2–for–3, one run scored and one RBI) followed with a base hit to center allowing Martens to advance to third. Gutridge (2–for– 4) then reached on an error to load the bases for Michele Shaw. Shaw reached on a fielder's choice scoring Martens and then a Jodi Sorenson grounder scored Buckley.

In the sixth, Tracey Osier (2–for–3, one run scored and one RBI) and Cardenas both singled to lead off the inning and both advanced a base on the throw. Osier then scored on a Martens sacrifice fly and Buckley drove in Cardenas with a double for UMass' sixth run.

Massachusetts 10, Rutgers 0
Rutgers 4, Massachusetts 1

Daut picked up the victory in the first game giving up only two hits, striking out six and walking only one, in five innings pitched. The game was stopped after five because of the mercy rule.

The Minutewomen used a six–run third inning to break open a scoreless game. After Stephanie Mareina grounded out to first, Martens walked and then reached second on an error by Karen Pelkey at third on a grounder off the bat of Buckley (2–for–2, two runs scored). Gutridge (3–for–3, three RBIs, one run scored) then singled to load the bases for Shaw (2–for–3, two RBIs, one run scored) who ripped a single scoring Martens and Buckley while advancing Gutridge to second.

UMass got the rest of their runs in this inning with two outs. With the bases loaded, Osier (2–for–3, two runs scored, one RBI) singled, scoring Gutridge, and loading the bases again, this time for Cardenas (1–for–2, three RBIs, one run scored). The hot hitting third baseman smashed a double clearing the bases and making the score 6–0.

The Minutewomen then put the game away in the bottom of the fifth plating four runs. The big blast of the inning came off the bat of Gutridge. The freshman came to the plate with the bases loaded and smacked a double to knock in all three of the runners.

In the second game, it seemed like UMass was going to pick up where it left off scoring a run in the bottom of the first inning. Cardenas (1–for–3, one run scored) led off with a single, reached second on a sacrifice bunt by Mareina (1–for–2) and then reached third on another sacrifice bunt, this

One of President Bill Clinton's key advisors will be the main speaker at the 125th Commencement at the University of Massachusetts, and several prestigious individuals, some of which are UMass alumnus, will be partaking in the graduation exercises.

W. Anthony Lake, the president's National Security Advisor, and a Mt. Holyoke College Professor of International Relations since 1981, will be the main speaker, and he will receive an honorary doctorate of law degree, according to Kay Scanlan, spokesperson for the University. The ceremony will be May 28 at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium, and nearly 4,000 will be receiving their degrees.

Lake, currently on leave since the Clinton administration took office in 1992, taught "brilliant" political science courses within the Five College consortium, according to Vincent Ferraro, Professor of International Relations at Mount Holyoke College.

Honorary degrees will be given to three people, two of which are UMass alumni.

Unita Z. Blackwell, who received a master's degree from UMass in regional planning and urban development in 1983, will be given a doctorate of law degree, Scanlan said. Mimi H. Silbert, who received a bachelors degree in English in 1963, will be given a doctorate of public service.

Arnold Hiatt, former chief executive officer and president of Stride Rite, will be given a doctorate in public service, Scanlan said. A 1948 graduate of Harvard University, Hiatt currently is chairman of The Stride Rite Foundation, the company's philanthropic arm. He is a former member of the Massachusetts Higher Education Coordinating Council.

Blackwell is the first African American woman elected mayor in Mississippi, according to John A. Feudo, director of alumni relations. She served from 1976–1993, and she was President of the National Conference of Black Mayors from 1990–1992, Scanlan said.

Silbert is the founder of the Delancey Street Foundation, a drug and alcohol rehabilitation program in San Francisco, Feudo said. As the Foundation's current president, Silbert is partially responsible for helping the approximate 10,000 successful patients who have gone through the Foundation's New York, New Mexico, North Carolina and California programs, Scanlan said.

Four marshals chosen

Four marshals have been named to lead the procession of faculty and distinguished visitors, Scanlan said. Two are faculty and two are alumni.

Christina Gonzalez, chair of the Spanish and Portuguese Department, and Arthur F. Kinney, Thomas W. Copeland Professor of Literary History will lead the faculty procession into the stadium, Scanlan said.

Doris C. Newman, a 1947 graduate and Francis T. Spriggs, a 1955 graduate, will lead the distinguished visitor's procession into the stadium, Scanlan said. Members of the UMass Board of Trustees, Massachusetts legislators and members of Higher Education Coordinating Council are included in the distinguished visitors.

W. Anthony Lake, President Clinton's National Security Advisor, has been selected as the main speaker for UMass' 125th Commencement ceremony. Lake is also slated to receive an honorary doctorate.

The undergraduate speaker will be Moise Tirado, a native of Haiti, according to Robert N. Brooks, director of student affairs special services. Tirado is a triple–major in political science, social thought and political economy and Afro– American studies.

Tirado was selected by a seven–member committee, four of which were students, and the remaining three were faculty members, said Brooks, who is in charge of undergraduate commencement. Applicants submitted a portion of their speech which was reviewed by the committee, and finalists auditioned as the committee decided upon Tirado.

Commencement for recipients of master's and doctoral degrees will be on May 27 at 10:30 a.m. in the William D. Mullins Center where more than 1,000 will be awarded, Scanlan said. Speakers include UMass System President Michael K. Hooker, Chancellor David K. Scott, and Graduate Dean Charlena M. Seymour.

The Stockbridge School of Agriculture will be awarding approximately 120 associate of science degrees, also on May 27, Scanlan said. The ceremony will be at 2 p.m. in the Bowker Auditorium, and the keynote speaker is Donald McMahon, president of the Massachusetts Association of Lawn Care Professionals.

Graduate student dies after speech at GSS elections

By Henry J. Brier

A University of Massachusetts graduate student died last night after collapsing minutes upon the completion of his campaign speech for treasurer in the Graduate Student Senate elections held in Campus Center room 174.

Robert M. Schapiro, 49, of 67 West St. Apt. 2 in Northampton, was rushed to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, where he died at approximately 9 p.m. of "some type of arrest," according to the nursing supervisor.

Schapiro, a graduate student in the School of Education, gave his speech, sat down, began shaking and then fell off his seat onto the ground where he lost consciousness at 8:15 p.m., according to witnesses.

While on the ground, Schapiro had extreme difficulty breathing, and he sporadically gasped for air, while Beth Almeida, also a graduate student, attempted to help him regain respiration and consciousness, witnesses said.

UMass Police responded, and shortly after that, the Amherst Fire Department arrived. Emergency Medical Technicians administered a defibrillator upon Schapiro, who at this time was in "full cardiac arrest," according to UMass Police. The Amherst Fire Department rushed him to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

Schapiro, the father of two, had a history of heart problems, and was getting over a cold, according to graduate students gathered in the hall outside of the room where resuscitation efforts took place.

Schapiro graduated from Columbia College in New York City in 1966, he said in his campaign speech last night. He worked at homeless shelters and soup kitchens and also drove a taxi before leaving for Massachusetts and settling in the Pioneer Valley.

Upon joining the graduate program at UMass, Schapiro worked as coalition coordinator for the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), he said, during his five–minute speech.

Schapiro was in the midst of establishing a prisoner support network for helping incarcerated individuals, according to GSS officials. He also taught at a Massachusetts Correctional Institution.

GEO officials described him as a well–known activist and member.

"I think it's encouraging that we mend our divisions, work together," Schapiro said in his speech. "That is my main goal."

Funeral arrangements have not yet been made.

Provost unclear on the future of GLBT program

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts does not offer a gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender studies program, and it is still unclear when or if such a program will be established.

On April 14, a coalition met with University Provost Patricia Crosson to speak in support of the program.

The coalition included representatives of the Undergraduate Student Senate, Graduate Student Senate, Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance, GLB Graduate Student Organization, and the Chancellor's Task Force on GLBT Matters.

According to coalition representatives, Crosson was presented with the following recommendations, which were originally issued by the Task Force in May 1993:

• secure annual funding for the LGB Studies Brown Bag Lecture Series

• release time for faculty interested in developing GLBT studies courses

• Visiting Faculty position in GLBT studies

The coalition also offered Crosson motions passed by the Student Government Association and the Graduate Student Senate. Both motions call for the University administration to enact the recommendations of the Task Force.

The SGA motion also supported the creation of a half–time staff position at the Program for GLB Concerns to oversee the start of a GLBT studies certificate program. The program would be in place by September.

Results of meeting inconclusive

Crosson could not be reached for comment, and as of yesterday, her advisor Javier Cevallos said he had not discussed the meeting with her to find out her reaction.

Several coalition representatives said that the results of the meeting were inconclusive.

According to current Task Force member Deborah May, "the provost claimed to have had absolutely no familiarity with or knowledge of our request up until the time of the meeting."

Crosson said she would "add up the money, think about it, and come back and talk later," said May, who is also co– speaker of the GLB Graduate Student Organization.

The provost had three main reservations about establishing a program, said David Anderson, SGA secretary of administrative affairs and member of the Task Force.

First, he said, Crosson was not convinced that GLBT studies is an "academic discipline." Second, she did not feel that the coalition had

Talk examines family values

Barbara Dafoe Whitehead spoke yesterday on the impact of social policy on American families.

Calling the American family an "island of socialism in a sea of capitalism," Barbara Dafoe Whitehead, vice president of the Institute for American Values, a New York think tank, said last night at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center the family should "assign resources to its members."

As the fifth speaker in the fifth annual Consumer Lecture Series sponsored by the department of consumer studies, Dafoe's lecture was entitled "Impact of Social Policy on American Families: Present and Future Implications."

Introduced by Warren F. Schumacher, professor of consumer studies, as "someone who has a passionate commitment to American families," and who has a "credential of family texture," he said the audience should be "challenged by her ideas and the perspective she brings."

Dafoe, an Amherst resident, said "the family has gone through a turbulent three decades" and economic restructuring has only benefited the rich.

She said the workplace has become more demanding and parents are working two jobs, "not for income but for benefits," causing family economy to be restructured.

"There are high levels of divorce and the family is fragmenting," she said, in pointing out that for every ten marriages, five to six end up being split, and three of ten families end up with a single mother.

"Family relationships are becoming looser, more fragile," she said. Father–child relationships are "weak," and children are being abandoned, causing deficient communication that results in "failing to stay in touch."

She said the average annual child support payment amounts to $3,000, abandoned by many fathers.

"Children in households without fathers are less likely to visit when they become adults," she said.

Dafoe said there are three main features that can broaden children's social world. They include a measure of dependability, binding with a contingency clause and standards that would set commitment, and voluntary associations which are found in America.

"American society in the '90s is designed for the sake of the grown–ups," she said.

As ways of changing trends, Dafoe said that divorce has to remain available because it serves as "a safety valve." Also, loveless and empty marriages can be ceased. She pointed out the divorce of Julia Roberts and Lyle Lovett as not surprising many, while the marriage of Lisa Marie Presley and Michael Jackson did.

In suggesting ways that the impact of divorce upon children can be minimized, Dafoe talked about what she called "managing the damage scenarios."

Mandatory courses for parents going through divorce, assisting children overcome the sense of grief, emphasizing mediation rather than the adversarial system with lawyers, and the reformulation of laws so that they bias towards children, were some ideas Dafoe brought up.

She also said that a "more equitable child support system" should be established. She also said that taxpayers should assume responsibility in the event that the parent does not.

'Substantive' efforts needed to find solutions

Editor's note: This article is the second in a series of three.

Although tension between student groups is a major factor in the rift between black and Jewish students on the University of Massachusetts campus, the administration also plays an integral role in the situation.

Both Black Student Union (BSU) president Shonwa Shamapande and Hillel president Nurit Ben–Harav voiced their displeasure with the manner in which Chancellor David K. Scott and his office have handled the conflicts that have periodically came to light.

"The University reacts rather than proacts," Shamapande said.

In particular, Shamapande said he was troubled by the blow–up that occurred during last year's visit by Minister Louis Farrakhan, which he concluded could have been avoided with better planning at the administrative level.

"Amherst College handled it much better than UMass," he said, noting that the UMass administration's denunciation of the Muslim leader alienated many students.

At the neighboring school, Shamapande said that Farrakhan's speech was preceded and followed by panel discussions, a precaution that he said he believes allowed opposing students to better understand the views of the Nation of Islam.

"Black nationalism is nothing new," he said. "It's just in a more recalcitrant form now."

Image over substance

"I've mixed feelings about the administration," said Ben– Harav. "They're more concerned with their reputation and image than solving problems."

Both Ben–Harav and Shamapande mentioned the recent Maya Angelou and Elie Wiesel speech as an example of this. While the event was enjoyable, they said, it didn't really deal with the problemi that occur on the campus.

"It was sort of a staged event," said Ben–Harav. "It was an image booster, but low on substance."

Shamapande offered further critique on the overall ineffectiveness of last month's meeting of the minds.

"To tell everyone to love each other is great," he said. "Until you walk out into the real world."

Shamapande also mentioned Dr. Laz and the Cure, a black–Jewish rap group who performed a joint Chanukah/Kwanzaa concert in 1993.

According to Shamapande, events like this miss the point, as they don't deal with the real substantive issues that need to be discussed.

Real world solutions

Both Ben–Harav and Shamapande recognize that the most prominent point of contention separating the black and Jewish communities in recent times has been that of black speakers considered anti–Semitic by some students.

Thus, the true test of whether the two communities can somehow compromise on other minor issues would seem to lie in compromising on this major issue.

Yet, neither Shamapande nor Ben–Harav seemed that optimistic about solutions to the tensions.

"Tensions are not bad," said Shamapande. "The second we endorsed multiculturalism, we accepted some tension."

However, he did say what he thought would be needed for a solu–

Taylor Y. Lincoln, 25, student

Taylor Y. Lincoln, 25, of 619 South East St. died in a car accident early Sunday morning.

Lincoln was a University of Massachusetts senior political science major set to graduate in May, according to Kay Scanlan, spokesperson for the University.

Lincoln's pick-up truck burst into flames after it drove off I-91 in Whatley and struck a tree.

He was pronounced dead at the scene.

Lincoln's Amherst residence was the only one that the University had knowledge of, Scanlan said.

tion: "A small, but rather big step" to allow the black community to deal with matters of their own community.

Farrakahn an issue

Shamapande's endorsement of the benefits of the Nation of Islam is indicative of what is perhaps the greatest ideological obstacle separating the two communities.

The BSU president said he sees the Farrakhan-led group as being constructive in trying to solve the socioeconomic woes of the majority of blacks in the United States.

He remarked that speeches dealing with these problems should not be seen as lashing out.

"The Nation of Islam is one of the few groups out there with a strategy," Shamapande said.

Conversely, Ben-Harav said that she believes that while the overall doctrine of black empowerment is important, the negative aspects of the message can not be ignored.

"I think there is a general ignorance about the meaning of anti-Semitism," she said.

"There is a standard which accepts anti-Semitism and doesn't see it as anti-Semitism."

Ben-Harav saying that the groups needed to stop bringing the anti-Semitic speakers. "They are uneoncerned with the feeling of the Jewish community."

"Until then I don't feel like we have a lot to talk about," Ben-Harav said.

Four arrested for possession of firearms

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Four individuals were arraigned after a Friday night arrest on North Pleasant Street for possession of firearms.

Joel Perez, 20, of Holyoke, Edwin Carmona, 23, of Holyoke, Frankie Rivera, 19, of Amherst and a juvenile were all arrested for two counts of possession of firearms without a license, receiving stolen property over $250 and possession of a firearm with obliterated serial numbers, according to police documents.

The police are investigating possible gang affiliation, said Chief John Luippold.

At approximately 8 p.m. on April 14, officer Robert J. Waskiewicz stopped a motor vehicle travelling north on North Pleasant Street outside Mark's Meadows school. The vehicle was pulled over for a license plate propped up in the rear window and operation without a valid inspection sticker, police said.

Waskiewicz called for back-up when he observed suspicious movement in the vehicle — an occupant in the back seat leaned down and then reappeared, police said.

Officer Patrick T. Archbald arrived on the scene and the vehicle was approached. The officers then spotted a hand gun in the car and the occupants were removed. In searching they found a second handgun, police said.

All four suspects were placed under arrest. The vehicle was reported stolen from Holyoke and the serial number from one of the guns was scraped off. One of the weapons was reported stolen, police said.

Three of the individuals pleaded not guilty today in Hampshire County District Court — the juvenile's records were closed. They were released on personal recognizance, according to the court clerk.

A case conference has been set for June 8.

Press conference greeted tepidly

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton tried to reclaim attention for his agenda last night with his first prime-time news conference since Republicans seized control of Congress. But the event generated little enthusiasm among broadcast networks.

The East Room session was portrayed by White House aides in advance as an effort, with Congress out of town, to stake out new ground for the battles following the GOP's 100-day drive.

Clinton is challenging Congress to complete its work on welfare reform by July 4, said presidential spokesman Mike McCurry. He also said Clinton would announce that two additional states — Missouri and Montana — have been granted waivers to give them more flexibility to develop their own welfare programs. That brings the number of states with such waivers to 27.

McCurry said Clinton would open the news conference with a statement contrasting his welfare plan with one a House-passed version that Clinton has threatened to veto.

Of the broadcast networks, both ABC and NBC said they had decided not to air the event live. CBS said only hours before the news conference that it would carry it. CNN and C-Span planned to carry the event live.

"Naturally we are somewhat disappointed that many of the commercial networks are not airing the news conference," McCurry said. But, he added, "We're confident that he will have an audience that is well worth the occasion."

That meant Clinton had the same network coverage that House Speaker Newt Gingrich got earlier in the month in an address to the nation. CBS, CNN and C-Span carried that address live.

While it was extraordinary for a speaker of the House to command any free network air time, presidents have traditionally been able to get such time from all the networks.

It was Clinton's first evening meeting with reporters since Aug. 3 — and only the fourth of his presidency.

"The president has rarely chosen to go before the country," McCurry said. "We are clearly doing so in part at this point because Congress is out, like the cherry blossoms. We have an opportunity ... to help shape the agenda as the Congress and the president think through solutions to the country's problems." Clinton portrayed the battle over welfare reform as a top item for the nation's next 100 days.

He criticizes the GOP-sponsored bill passed by the House — which would deny benefits to children born to teen-age mothers — as being too harsh on children and failing to provide programs stressing return to work.

Workshop to target TA development

By Rana Meyer
Collegian Correspondent

The Center for Teaching is holding a workshop in the Campus Center today on collaborative learning in the diverse classroom.

This workshop, the third in a series for teaching assistant development, is open to graduate TAs and anyone else interested in learning more about their profession, according to Jocelyn Vargas, an organizer of the event.

These workshops show the TAs how to teach instead of what to teach, Vargas said.

"As a past TA, there hadn't been very much training on teaching strategies to help interacting with students," Vargas said.

This program has been designed to provide participants with the opportunity to acquire information about who populates today's classrooms, to explore how the teaching styles of educators impact learning, and to consider the importance of the content of what is taught in the classrooms, said Matthew Oullett, a member of the CFT staff.

Every fall, the Center for Teaching holds an orientation for new TAs which includes a full day of workshops, but Vargas said that they wanted a more broad program for new and old TAs.

"The primary goal of the CFT is to offer opportunities for professional development in teaching at the University," said Mary Deane Sorcinelli, the director of the CFT.

The programs and activities provide a variety of ways to share the talent, energy, perspectives and expertise of faculty members at this University and to increase communication about teaching within and between departments and colleges, Sorcellini said.

Vargas said that the turnout has been increasing at every workshop.

"The first workshop didn't have a huge turnout, because of poor publicity. But, the second workshop had more than 50 people," Vargas said.

At the conclusion of each workshops, group interviews are held to solicit feedback from the TAs for future programs, Vargas said.

According to Oullett, the response from the TAs has been very positive.

"People want to have more opportunities like this," Vargas said. "We think that it is important to get in touch with TAs to find in what they need training."

The CTF is currently gathering data on what the TAs want the center to do for them in the future," Vargas said.

The workshop will take place today in the Campus Center from noon to 2 p.m. for anyone that is still interested in participating.

Children to be special guests at planned rally

Children of University of Massachusetts students and UM employees will be the special guests at a planned rally to be held on the steps of the Student Union today at noon.

The goal of the rally is to voice concerns of the Graduate Employees Organization (GEO) over President Hooker's Action Plan for the Year 2000.

According to GEO, the plan contains proposed TA cuts, lack of child care, higher housing costs and higher tuition and fees as well as other issues concerning UMass in general and graduate students in particular.

One of the main issues for GEO is the perceived lack of concern for student childcare on campus.

"I have to make this issue much more visible," said Cecilia Rio, GEO Childcare Coordinator.

One way to make the issue more visible is to invite student and employee parents bring their children to campus to let the faculty see them, Rio said.

Part of the perceived lack of concern stems from an incident which occurred at the April 6 faculty senate meeting. A presentation by Becky Forest, a graduate student and mother of two, discussing the impact of the University's childcare policies was cut short to attend to other business.

John Bracey, speaker for the faculty senate called the incident a "misunderstanding" and added that Forest would be allowed to speak at the next senate meeting on Thursday, if she wished.

did not feel that the coalition had done enough to justify the need for a program. Finally, said Anderson, the provost admitted that she was "unprepared" and unable to make any commitment on behalf of the administration.

Anderson said that although no definitive action was taken, Crosson agreed to meet with the coalition later on in the semester.

One member of the coalition expressed optimism that the provost would come out in support of a GLBT studies program. Darrin Shaffer, co-speaker of the GLB Graduate Student Organization, said he was "disappointed" by the meeting. However, he said he was confident that Crosson would read the proposal, "realize its merits," and come forth with "moral leadership and financial support."

However, if Crosson fails to come out in support of the program or takes too long to decide, the coalition will lead its members in a public protest, Anderson said.

There may be a rally, and representatives from the various groups will be writing letters to Chancellor David K. Scott.

The coalition will also be seeking support from faculty members, he said.

Anderson and several other coalition representatives charged the University with "moral hypocrisy" with regard to its stance on diversity and multiculturalism.

Although the administration "pays lip service" to these ideas, he said, it has done little to advance them through financial support, especially in areas of curricula.

"How much of a priority is multiculturalism if they're not willing to put money behind it?" Anderson asked.

May found it difficult to believe that Crosson had never heard of the proposal or any of the recommendations prior to the meeting on April 14. Cevallos, one of her advisors, is a member of the Task Force and must have discussed the program with her.

Cevallos said that although he has served on the Task Force since Fall 1994, has never brought the issue up with his boss because the Task Force has not yet completed work on a formal proposal.

However, said Shaffer, "saying you're unprepared will only work once." Next time, he said, "it just won't wash."

well as Algernon's brother. This has a layered meaning: Jack really did always have a brother, and upon checking military records, he learns his Christened name is Ernest.

Directors Virginia Scott and Richard Trousdell incorporated an innovative first scene, beginning with Wilde himself, played by James Clark, listening to the guilty verdict in his third re-trial for charges of homosexuality (outlawed in 19th century England). Wilde then is met by the stage manager (Kenneth Ward), who hands the puzzled man a pamphlet detailing the symposium, "Oscar Wilde: The writer in the theater" of which this production was the centerpiece. True to the play's fashion, Clark then shifts to portraying Lane, though Lane is listed as played by Wilde.

Regulating the Internet

A college student was recently arrested for posting a pornographic story on the Internet. His tale concerned rape, torture and psychological abuse. His main female character, the victim, was named after a fellow student; he was arrested for threatening her.

This incident led to the introduction of Senate Bill 314 by Sen. James Exon (D. Neb.), the "Communications Decency Act," which would allow the government and telecommunications service providers to monitor all computer communications, from stories to private e-mail. Any server that violates the Act's decency standards would be subject to prosecution.

Peter Orvetti

The story in question was posted on a Usenet newsgroup called alt.sex.stories. I logged on, and here is some of what I found.

One story, "Suzanne's New Career," dealt with a man who meets a woman in a bar and drugs her. He brings her home with him, loads her with aphrodisiacs and has sex with her. Over the next few weeks, he gives her combinations of drugs until she devolves to a state of perpetual sexual desire. He uses this to humiliate her, tease her, and to force her to beg. He forces her to have sex with strangers in public places, then makes her say she enjoyed it.

Finally he brings her to the ultimate humiliation: he strips her of identity. He changes her name, closes her bank account, and makes her move in with him. While he spends his days arranging clients to sell her to, she is forced to watch pornographic films and exercise without breaks so that she will become more attractive. In the final scene, he sells her to another man in a bar. Thoroughly degraded, she calls the new man "master" and talks about how much she will enjoy doing anything he asks.

Another story, "No Witness," is about a nine-year-old girl, Bonnie, and her mother. Bonnie's mother is kidnapped, blindfolded, tied down, and raped repeatedly by four men for an entire month. Then the men steal Bonnie. Again drugs are used: Bonnie is given a sedative so that she will not be able to resist. Both mother and daughter are injected with drugs that will make intercourse unbearably painful for them. They are also given aphrodisiacs so that they will still want sex anyway. Bonnie is then forced to perform oral sex in front of her bondaged mother, and to tell her mother how much she enjoys sex. They are both murdered at the end of the story.

These are the running themes of alt.sex.stories. There is little true erotica to be found. Instead, postings deal with rape, murder, pedophilia, humiliation and nonconsensual S&M. Most often, the stories involve men demeaning and dominating women, ending with the woman reduced to a subhuman position. Many stories involve physical torture. Women are men's playthings, and have no choice but to follow and do as they are commanded.

This is violence against women on the highest level, and it should be dealt with. However, the Exon bill is not the way to do it. Purveyors of such stories can be prosecuted without infringing on the First Amendment. The college student now in custody will probably go to jail. Other can be arrested on similar counts, for threatening the safety of the women around them.

The Exon bill exploits this case to go far beyond pornography. It is a cynical effort by the government to restrict free expression on the Internet. Sen. Exon is using this incident to justify violating both the First and Fourth Amendments: speech and privacy. He wants the FBI to be able to go into your mailbox, just in case you might be doing something the government wouldn't like. And with the current right-wing trend, a lot of things fall under that category.

But there is another reason to resist S. 314. Gagging a rabid mongrel does not make it any less dangerous. The stories are a threat, but it is more of a threat to know that there are men who find such things titillating. You can't tell who they are by looking at them. Exon, and anti-porn crusaders like Catherine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin, conspire to keep these men silent. But they will still be there.

Rather than censoring these abusers, we must act to make it societally unacceptable to contribute to violent pornography. We must make these men ashamed to look in the mirror. Even in prison, the college student has no idea what he did wrong. Through years of work, it has become unacceptable to abuse women, while decades ago it was considered a part of normal life. Violence goes on, but we are gaining on it. These "storytellers" must be made to feel as reprehensible and degraded as the women they violate with their prose.

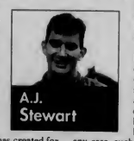
The injustice of admissions

"How did your mother die?" The question seemed simple enough. It was just another curious, sympathetic person who wanted to know how Gina Grant became an orphan. Not wanting to delve into the past, Gina responded that she died in a car accident. It was natural enough, as Gina had repeated this account many times to those she did not know well enough to trust.

Harvard's rejection of Gina Grant is important and telling on two fronts. First, it exposes the incredibly arrogant, misguided elitism that surrounds admissions at Prestigious U. And secondly, it demonstrates that our criminal justice system, even for juveniles, has retribution at its foundation, not rehabilitation.



A.J. Stewart

Charles Eliot, former president of then Harvard College, once remarked that Harvard does not tolerate deception. A century later the admissions office, in keeping with this tradition, revoked Gina Grant's early acceptance because she lied in her interview. No one mentioned matricide as the cause for this abrupt withdrawal, only the fact that she misrepresented the circumstances surrounding her mother's death.

Examine the logical position Harvard has created for itself. Publicly, it has condemned Gina only for her dishonesty, in an attempt to appear sympathetic to the abuse leading to the murder. This is fairly paradoxical. Harvard can understand a victim of an alcoholic mother deciding to beat her parent with a candlestick. But it can't fathom that a nervous young girl interviewing to attend the university of her dreams might decide to avoid a can of worms by not truthfully answering such a throwaway question.

Why is the manner of a parent's death the business of Harvard University? The interviewer has no real right to know this information. It simply is not pertinent to a person's credentials. No rational person would have presented herself as a murderer under such circumstances. Harvard has no right to condemn a dishonest answer to a question that it should not have posed. Lying, apparently, is unforgivable, while murder can be overlooked.

It is probably not necessary to point out that Harvard is a thousand times more insincere than Gina Grant by offering up this as the reason for her sudden denial of admission. Had her mother actually died in a car crash instead of being murdered, Gina Grant undoubtedly would be spending next fall walking The Yard and spending her trust fund at The Coup.

Apparently, the fact that Gina was an orphan entitled her to a rare offer of early admission. The school let her in not because she was a leader in her school and community, or because she volunteered her time to aid children, or even because she has an I.Q. of 150. None of these things distinguish her enough to qualify her for admission. It was the little Orphan Annie routine that made her stand out. And when admissions learned this orphaned state was, let's say, artificial, then she was no longer special enough to warrant early admission.

In fact, she wasn't let in at all. If Harvard can truly make meaningful decisions using such criteria, then it calls into serious question their admissions process. To get into Harvard, an applicant needs a distinctive family life, or racial heritage, or a skill in sports. Heck, maybe being able to put both legs behind one's head will do the trick. In any case, such an explanation is insufficient at best, and at worst is plain lunacy.

Unfortunately, the Gina Grant case is sadder when viewed as commentary on society at large. The juvenile justice system is designed to reform and to protect the people who are involved in it. Under law, Gina's sealed record allowed her to legally and truthfully claim that she was in good standing under the law. She should be judged on the life she has led since the ordeal, and not on a solitary act of desperation performed at age 14.

But we are not a culture that forgives and forgets. We enjoy the persecution, the punishment. We might as well brand our convicted criminals, putting scarlet letters on their foreheads. Our society puts people to jail to punish them, not to reform them. Gina Grant's amazing progress and reformation is meaningless to people who don't care to look, who don't see a criminal as a human being. Harvard is merely a terrible extension of ourselves.

UMass should be proud of CRC

To the editor:

The University of Massachusetts has every right to be proud of its Cannabis Reform Coalition. While there are many sources of pride — the fine sports teams come to mind — there is, after all, a difference in kind between playing with balls and working for the betterment of society. The CRC has grown to be the largest and most active civil rights organization on campus; and it is made up of some of the finest, most highly motivated, and tireless young people I have ever had the privilege to meet. They should be an inspiration to all of us.

The cold, biting winds at this past weekend's Extravaganja Rally were but a minor nuisance to these activists, who must daily brave an onslaught of hostility. Yet, they persevere — as an earlier generation of students did against the war of their era. As in the '60s, they face criticism of everything from their seriousness and relevancy to their patriotism and virtue.

The previous civil rights and anti-war movements stayed the course and overcame. We can only wish for equal success for these dedicated idealists. For the ending of Prohibition — an evil that has caused so much harm to so many people — is clearly the issue of the '90s. The modern day Puritans, who have the power behind their intolerance to jail those who disagree with them, need to be defeated now. We don't want to wait another 25 years for the McNamaras of our age to tell us they were wrong.

The only bad thing about the CRC is that it stands alone. The undergraduate students are doing a wonderful job, but what is needed now is for the University, as an institution, to take a leadership role on this issue. A small first step for the administration to stop dragging its feet, and institute the duly-voted CRC check-off on the student bill. But we should expect even more. A great university has a duty to society to speak out against hatred; not to sit idly by. Large institutions, it seems, often make ducking controversy their principal occupation; but perhaps this time, the University of Massachusetts may be able to gain inspiration from its own students.

Editorial mistaken about women's roles

To the editor:

First, women have been providing for their families, or "bringing home the bacon," for centuries. there were many societies, throughout history, that had been run by women, That's right, despite what some men may think, women have been taking care of themselves — doing a "man's job," for centuries.

Secondly, Mr. Young raises the point that women bear children. Due to this, "it naturally follows that women should be the ones to stay home and care for the kids." This conveniently forgets the obvious fact that women cannot impregnate themselves. There needs to be some outside force involved — usually, a man. Because a man does not physically carry a child, does this absolve him of child care responsibilities? I guess being responsible is not part of the "man's job."

And let's talk about the biological place argument. Take, for example, World War II. While the men were away overseas, women were finally allowed to work in jobs previously labeled as too dangerous and complicated for women to understand. This was proven wrong by the thousands of woman who went to work in factories to support the war effort — working previous man-only jobs.

Remember "Rosie the Riveter?" These women were told by men that they were needed for the war effort. They were encouraged, for the first time, to work outside the home. Then when the war ended and the men came home, the jobs were suddenly too complicated for them again and they were given pink slips. Economics is the answer to this oppression, not the natural order of the sexes.

There is no need for men to go out and hunt food, and even if there was, there is no reason why women couldn't go too. I can't believe that Mr. Young is trying to convince intelligent college women that their natural place is in the home, barefoot and pregnant. Then why are we here? There's no point in getting a college education if we are just going to pop out babies and serve men for the rest of our lives. Oh wait — maybe we should take some home economics classes so we can learn how to make those turkey pot pies.

A woman's place is anywhere she wants it to be. If she wants it to be in the home, there is nothing wrong with that. If she wants a career, there shouldn't be restrictions placed on her. If wanting equality makes me a feminist, then I guess I am. I cannot accept that merely because I was born a female, I am automatically inferior to men. I shouldn't have to, because it's not true. Any man who continues to do so is sadly mistaken. And now, you must excuse me — I have to go out and hunt some buffalo.

Sarah Coffey
Central

I don't know where to start with you Evan Young but where do you live? You need to evolve before they let you write for the Collegian again. Your ideas on women and their "place" in this world are ancient. Your statement about women belonging in the home because it is our "biological job" shows just how incredibly neandrathalic your brain is.

How can you live in today's society and say that women belong in the home to raise children and take care of the house for their men who are "bringing home the bacon?" Here is a reality check for you, it is many women who are now going off to work, bringing home the bacon and providing and caring for children without the help of any male. Women do need a man to take care of them anymore. This is not the Middle Ages.

What has been right for society in the past in not necessarily right for society now. The expectations of society have changed over the years and the reasons that they have changed are because these ideals are no longer and the only reason that they are still around is because they are supported by ignorant people like you.

If you paid attention to any United States history you would have realized that you have quite a few common misconceptions in your article. For one it is not just recently that women have begun to fight and break out of the domestic prison that men had created for us. It has been hundreds of years that women have fought for their equality. Even before the Civil War there was the formation of the Women's Rights Movement. Women have fought for the right to vote, to work, and for equal pay for the work they do.

Obviously if the stereotypical roles that society prescribed to women were right or natural then there would not be this movement for change. Change occurs when there is something wrong with the way things are. This has held true for many movements in our history as human beings. Slavery would not have been abolished, nor Hitler overcome or women given the right to vote if they were not meant to be. You are resisting the natural evolution of our society and its women and you are the unnatural element here.

Another area of history where you made erroneous statements was in your portrayal of Native American (not Indian, I don't believe that there are any buffalo in India) society. Women in Native American societies were tribal leaders, governmental heads, keepers of stories, medicine people and gatherers of food. These women were revered, respected and loved. In these societies there were also many women warriors. Native American women did not sit home and have babies while their husbands hunted buffalo. I suggest that you research what you want to write about before you do so.

I think that you need to re-evaluate your society Evan Young because you are out of touch with reality. Women and men are equal in their work abilities, intellectual abilities and their desire for personal satisfaction. Housework leaves little room for the fulfillment of these desires and if men would realize this, they would see why so many women have broken into the work force and that this is where we are going to stay whether men like Evan Young like it or not.

Heather Navin
Central

Bringing this enlightenment or argument to the present, I would like to remind Evan and all young ignorant men agreeing with his beliefs of the 18 percent of single mother families dependent on women's pay alone. 70 percent of 57 million women earn less than $20,000 per year. 40 percent of these women earn less than $10,000 per year. Women are locked in a patriarchal system that for centuries has kept them dependent on men. Well, look out baby, there are plenty of women, many of your classmates, who are collecting the tools of knowledge and experience, that will tear down the patriarchal boundaries surrounding our system.

The duties of the home you speak of do not belong to only the women but the man as well, equally. The "super woman" image society creates of the working mother with everything together is unacceptable and impossible to live up to. If we are going to create a better future, living in unity and equality, we must educate our youth in an unbiased view. Men and women who create the home must work together to create a happy and healthy home, a happy, healthy place the future to reside.

In your closing sentence responding to housework you state, "In many ways, it is a more respectable job to do, and it is one of the things that men will never be able to do." I think to myself yes it is a respectable job, but the pay sucks! That is exactly why men will never be able to do it: money, control, power, that's what it comes down to: you said it yourself.

Saunders, Rainforest Band to play Noho

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

For the past 30 years, Merl Saunders has been composing, directing, producing, recording and touring for his distinct style of R&B and blues. Tomorrow Saunders will bring his hefty collection of tunes, along with his Rainforest Band, to Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton.

Although Saunders has yet to become a household name he has worked with such musical luminaries as Dr. John, John Popper of Blues Traveler and Norton Buffalo. His 1990 release, Blues From The Rainforest, was a collaboration with Grateful Dead frontman Jerry Garcia and included the talents of funk-master George Clinton and jazz legend Dave Brubeck.

His greatest achievement is considered to be his Live At Keystone release (which also features Jerry Garcia), which is renowned by many musical enthusiasts as one of the most impressive live album ever. In 1985, Saunders co-wrote the theme song for the CBS re-incarnation of "The Twilight Zone" with members of the Grateful Dead. In 1992 he made his triumphant return to television when he scored the music for an episode of "Tales From The Crypt" entitled "On A Deadman's Chest."

Although he has chalked up an extensive discography since he began recording in 1963, Saunders is best known for his hectic touring schedule which finds him and his band relentlessly traveling the United States.

COURTESY SUMMERTONE RECORDS

Merl Saunders will bring his Rainforest band to Pearl Street tomorrow night.

The band is currently touring for latest album It's In The Air which has been receiving airplay on AOR radio nationally.

Saunders is also a member of the Board of Governors of the San Francisco Chapter of the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences (NARAS) and an associate producer for the Grammy Awards.

Merl Saunders & The Rainforest Band will be performing at Pearl Street tomorrow. Tickets are $8/advance; $10/at the door. The show is 18+. Doors open at 8:30.

'VR5' moves into cyberspace; writers strive for thrills, action

By Scott Williams
Associated Press

NEW YORK — John Sacret Young, the executive producer of Fox's "VR.5," has a slight confession to make about the intricate plot of his haunting, stylish, white-knuckled science-fiction mystery thriller.

"When we began, we didn't have a grand design," he admits. "So we were kind of caught by the discovery after we started shooting."

Young and company finessed the oversight with a recent episode called "5-D." Its first title was "3-A," he said, "because there we were shooting the fourth episode and we suddenly went, 'Wait a minute, we forgot the one that comes between three and four!'"

"VR.5" stars Lori Singer as Sydney Bloom, a shy, reclusive computer geekette who discovers an uncanny ability to use her "homebrew" computer to enter the fifth level of virtual reality — VR.5 — where she can infiltrate other minds at preconscious level.

Sydney's adventures in these surreal, dreamlike landscapes get her conscripted into the sweaty, paranoiac ranks of a covert organization called "The Committee," which fears her power even as it studies her.

Sydney also is led to reconsider her traumatic memories of the deaths of her father (played by David McCallum) and twin sister, Samantha, and the traumatic catatonia that subsequently befell her mother (Louise Fletcher).

It's a demanding series, requiring the viewer to pay attention to details of character and plot, and to fit the episodic pieces together into a coherent whole.

"The cyber-freaks have attacked us for being technologically inaccurate or doing what television does, and we've been very quiet because, you know, they're going off a little too soon. Young said."

Fans of "VR.5" will be chagrined to learn that there are three "lost episodes" if the series is not renewed.

Young, who created and produced the Emmy-winning "China Beach" for ABC from 1988 to 1991, speaks of the former series like an old friend who died too young. "VR.5" is also at risk.

"Some people in Fox love it, and some others think it's too far out there," Young said.

Burmese dancer, mime to entertain

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will be able to experience both Burmese and Japanese culture this week through the artistic mediums of theater and dance.

On Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2 p.m. in the Hampden Theater, the New WORLD Theater will end their season with local mime/actress/storyteller Motoko Maeda- Dworkin in her original work My Snow White.

The one-woman show by the talented Japanese performer is a semi-autobiographical account of her journey from child to woman.

Told in mime, the actresses movements are set to the music of a piano, marimba and flute. She uses movement, facial expressions and wit, which create real characters and not fictional images that mimes are usually known for.

My Snow White consists of three acts that weave together to create a touching and amusing story.

Act I, "My Mother and I," chronicles Maeda-Dworkin's childhood through a series of memories both fraught with joy and pain. Act II, "Into the Woods Named Tokyo," shows a young woman moving from the security of her home and into the city where she becomes a waitress. The final act, "My Prince Comes, and Goes," shows the conflict between a woman's dreams and the conflicting love she feels for man mixing both tradition ideals and modern ones together.

At the Augusta Savage Gallery, U Win Maung will perform a traditional Burmese dance at 7 p.m. The performance is free and open to the public.

Traditional Burmese dance is a combination of folk and classical elements. His technique has become an official branch of the Shwe Man Thabin Theatrical Troupe which was also founded by his father.

Maung left Burma in 1988 and has performed and taught his style of dance in New York, San Francisco, Chicago and Indonesia.

Elisha Fernandes, a curator at the Augusta Savage Gallery said that the exhibition is worth watching.

"We went to see his performance somewhere else and it was really colorful and very elaborate," said Fernandes. "He will be performing two dances with two different costumes. He will also have another person with him to talk about his [Maung] history and where he is from."

The Augusta Savag: Gallery is located in the New Africa House in the Central Residence area. Tickets are $6 general; $5 students, children under 16 and senior citizens. For more information call the New WORLD Theater at 545- 1972.

Lecture explores Latino women through images

By Zaw Min Oo
Collegian Correspondent

The voices of Latino women are not often heard in the United States. They are given little attention and lack credit for their role in America. The ears of many in the audience tuned to this message from Papusa Molina, a visiting assistant professor of women's studies at Hamilton College, who explained her viewpoints on the image of Latino women on Thursday night at Herter Hall.

She followed her brief lecture by screening three short films directed by Latino women. The event was sponsored by the Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies as part of the on going Multicultural Film Festival.

Papusa used the films to explain the image of Latino women. She eleborated on the term "Recobrar," which literally means recovery. The term more importantly translates as looking back at indigenous roots.

"The significance of recobrar is that it helps Latino women in their recovery of tradition," Papusa explained.

She also brought the audience to the attention of the term "Borderlands." Papusa elaborated that "Borderlands is a place created by the residue of natural bonding." She mentioned that this is a new culture that seems to be developing among Latinos.

Furthermore, her most notable description was that Latino women are trying to bring about their less recognized selves from the oneness of the term "Latino." From this duality that includes man and woman, Papusa expressed the differences of gender by expounding the individuality concept of "Latina Culture."

The first film that was presented was La Zona de Canal. This film centered about an American born Panamanian woman trying to find her roots in Panama. The woman's mother, who was the main actor, explained the life she had in Panama and how she wanted to fall in love and move to the United States. Visiting Panama for holidays, the woman used this experience to elaborate her close feeling she had for her homeland. In the end the woman expressed that in finding her roots, she was "in the process [to] create a newself of recreating history."

The second film that was presented was entitled Mujeria: Primitive and Proud. It explored the culture of the Olmecs, an ancient American Indian tribe. The importance of the Olmecs was that it portrayed the way of life in America before the white man came.

The last film screened was The Couple In The Cage. It was about a man and a woman who lived in a cage. Touring around the world, the couple was advertised as the last of the primitive people. Many who saw the couple in the display cage believed this silly disguise and a few felt insulted when they were interviewed after. Although it looked like a large joke, this scheme was a depiction of ignorance by many not understanding the world they live in.

These three films were produced to expose the identity of the Latino women who made these films. The University has planned to purchase them soon so there will be a chance for students to view and learn more about the "Latina culture."

Poet delights crowd with political views, witticism

JACK AGUEROS
Augusta Savage Gallery
April 13

Poet Jack Agueros made for a special evening last Thursday night at the Augusta Savage Gallery. The small gallery was packed with people eagerly listening to Mr. Agueros' home–spun Puerto Rican poetry.

Mr. Agueros was born in New York City in 1934. This was made very apparent to the audience since he made many references to the place in virtually every poem. He has worked with virtually all forms of literary expression, from poetry to journalism to essays and was introduced as probably one of the only people to write for New York Newsday and for Sesame Street.

The influence of Puerto Rico on his writing is strong. His poetry contained many references to Puerto Rico and to its culture.

Mr. Agueros is an Puerto Rican activist, and his poetry clearly reflected his concerns. In one called "Sonnet on the History of Puerto Rico" he made scathing remarks in support of his homeland and its sovereignty. He said Puerto Rico once was under Spanish control then it was "put in an American cell."

He also showed contempt for Columbus in a poem called "Sonnet After Columbus." In the piece he talked about people and prison in regards to Columbus's voyage. The poem ended with Puerto Ricans being in a metaphoric prison and their "charge: not throwing tea in the bay," referring to the Boston Tea Party.

In a touching poem Agueros talked about the Puerto Rican painter Eli Blanco. The piece chronicled Blanco's immigration to the United States from Puerto Rico. He resented coming so much he refused to learn and speak English. He was sent to a mental hospital where they gave him electric shock treatment. Agueros showed his gift for analogy when describing this episode as he "shaked hands with the third rail." This also showed the influence of the city on Agueros.

Agueros showed a great sense of humor. In one piece called "Psalm For Modernization" he spun a hilarious tale about New Jersey bishops who were upset about the State Lottery cutting into their bingo takes. Agueros hatched an interesting solution, the Church could have slot machines and if a person got three bleeding hearts of Jesus then they won the jackpot.

Agueros proved with his wit, charm and humor that poetry is meant to be heard read by the author.

Wilde's play brought to life on stage

Intricate plotline, good acting make for enjoyable evening

THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST
Curtain Theater
April 14

In the fifth of six performances, Oscar Wilde's self–proclaimed "trivial comedy for serious people," The Importance Of Being Earnest, unfolded exquisitely in the intimate space of the Fine Arts Center Curtain Theater. Though this biting critique of Victorian Era aristocracy is slightly dated, the production was a fitting tribute to Wilde on the centennial of its first run in London's St. James's Theater.

In the first of three acts, none of which are divided into scenes, Algernon Moncrieff, played to perfection by George Fearn, and John "Jack" Worthing (Skid Maher) divulge their love interests and the complications that arise from their relations. Jack is smitten by the Honorable Gwendolen Fairfax (Megan McEnulty), who mostly loves him for the name he uses in her presence — Earnest — "the only really safe name."

Algernon's great passion is "Bunburying," the practice of exploiting one's false identity. Since Jack tells his lovely young ward, Cecily (Deirdre O'Keefe), that Earnest is his much maligned brother, Cecily's interest in righting Earnest grows and Algernon gets the idea for his best Bunbury ever: masquerading as the imaginary Earnest to snare Cecily.

Jack, fearing that Cecily is too intrigued by Earnest, kills his imaginary brother. This spawns second act hilarity when Jack arrives at his Manor House, dressed in funeral garb, only to find Algernon courting Cecily as the man whose death Jack mourns.

Fearn injects a delightful dose of witty intellect in his role, ideal since his is hardly a stock character. Maher maintains just the right balance of tight seriousness and shady deviance that make Jack such a study in contradiction.

Act I concludes with a raucous exchange between Jack and Lady Bracknell, Algernon's aunt (expertly depicted by Linda McInerney of the Actors' Equity Association), as the hopeful suitor confesses he knows not who his parents are, for he was found lying in a handbag in Victoria Station.

Although Wilde's satire targets an unfamiliar class, his script is so rich in precise, piercing words and the cast delivered them with dead–eye accuracy. The joy of Act II is McEnulty and O'Keefe's misinformed debate, as Cecily proudly announces her engagement to Ernest (actually Algernon), infuriating Gwendolen, who contends she shares the same engagement, though she truly loves Jack.

The play's stirring complexity settles with a wonderful twist: Lady Bracknell grills Miss Prism (Mary Elizabeth McCue), Cecily's tutor, on the location of the baby boy Prism looked after one day 28 years ago. Prism states she mistakenly swapped her manuscript, left in a stroller and the baby, left in her handbag. Jack realizes he was the infant, then Bracknell informs Jack he is her nephew as

Women's crew defeats Naval Academy

By Chris Stamm
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts women's varsity crew was victorious over the U.S. Naval Academy in a competition held last Saturday on Lake Carnegie in Princeton, NJ.

The women's varsity eight boat took an early five second lead in the first 500 meters of the race as they went on to beat the Midshipmen by seven seconds, clocking in with a time of 7:02.

"We were really psyched to beat Navy because they come into school as athletes and especially because a lot of us had gone to Annapolis and lost two years ago as novices," said Amanda Kraus, senior co–captain.

Following the varsity eight boat's lead, the UMass second varsity eight boat proved to be equally as strong. Despite forceful race day winds, the second varsity eight boat rocked Navy's second varsity eight boat by 13 seconds, crossing the line at 7:30 to the Midshipmen's 7:45.

"The varsity boats did real well. Though they were not too happy with the rowing itself, they were never in danger of being passed and were happy with the win," UMass assistant coach Deanna Runeman said.

Unfortunately, the other three UMass boats didn't leave New Jersey with their opponents jerseys. Crew tradition dictates the losing team gives their jerseys to the victors.

The UMass varsity four boat finished 25 seconds behind Navy with a time of 9:20 as the UMass first novice eight boat finished 32 seconds behind their Navy counterparts with a time of 8:25.

Rounding out the days competitions, the UMass second novice eight boat finished five seconds behind the Navy boat with a time of 8:32.

"They were ahead for the first 750 meters of the race, but Navy edged them out in the end," Runeman said.

Following the two victories over Navy, the two varsity eight boats are currently undefeated. Earlier in the season, the Minutewomen posted wins over Boston College and won the Visitors Cup at the San Diego Crew Classics, which qualified them to compete in the prestigious Whittier Cup in April of 1996.

"No one is becoming complacent about [the season's victories]. We realize it's going to take a lot to go on to Nationals and New Englands and win it all," Kraus said.

On Saturday, the Minutewomen travel to Durham, N.H., to face the Division I (sprint class) University of New Hampshire Wild Cats. In its inaugural season as a varsity sport, the UMass women's crew team is currently competing against mostly Division II schools.

"It should be really exciting to see how well we can compete against a Division I school," Kraus said.

to having thoughts of putting his lacrosse career behind him.

"I've thought about hanging it up, but I know I wouldn't be happy," said Murphy, who admitted at times to hating his knee. "There has been times where my knee has been such a focus in my life.

"There have been times where I have literally hated it. It's been very tough. But you can't keep that mentality and survive. If you look at it that way, you'll eat yourself up inside."

Murphy didn't give up on his lacrosse career and his unfulfilled dreams.

"It's all about dreams. You've had dreams since you were a little kid. I've had those dreams of coming down and scoring the winning goal at the National Championship. That dream on that day when I blew my knee out initially was almost stripped away."

His teammates stood by him, encouraging him throughout his rehabilitation, and Murphy admits to leaning on their support.

"When I'm down and I'm injured, the team has always been there patting me on the back," said Murphy, who singled out two fellow seniors. "My two best friends up here are Jared Lanning and Vinny Dello–Iacono. Vinny has carried me off the field. He's seen me blow out my knee, when I was at Herkimer. I've had a lot of heart–to–hearts with them. They've been a great support. That means a lot to me."

Flying start to senior season

Six games into this his final season, Murphy is healthy. He is the team's second leading goal scorer (14) coming off a five–goal effort in a loss to Delaware.

Aside from occasional swelling, Murphy has been able to a regular contributor.

"When I get the ball I'm looking to shoot. When the opportunity is given to you, you have to stick it," Murphy said matter–of–factly. "That's my job. If I take 10 shots, I should be getting five or six of them."

Murphy credits first–year coach Greg Cannella with utilizing him properly despite his injuries.

"It's just as hard to coach an injured player than for a player himself to go out there and do what he has to do," Murphy said. "Coach Cannella is nervous a lot of the time I'm out there. He's been great. He's helped me out a lot. I didn't think he understood it before, but I know now that he does, and I think my teammates do to."

Seeing Murphy back on the field has been inspirational, according to Lanning and Dello–Iacono.

"I think it's a motivator for the younger guys," Lanning said. "To show even if you are hurt, you can play, if you have the desire that Murph has."

"He goes out there every game like it's the championship, because it could be the last time he could be playing," Dello–Iacono said.

The knee remains in the back of his mind, however.

"When I'm out on the field, I know where my leg is going everytime," he said. "I have to know where I'm planting my leg. It's that fragile. I can't make certain cuts on the field, which takes something away from my ability to play."

Through the entire ordeal, Murphy's love of the game has remained intact.

"I have a great passion for the sport of lacrosse. If I'm with my teammates, just hanging around, I'll start talking about it," Murphy said. "It's almost disgusting how much I think about lacrosse. I'll be sitting in class, thinking about things I have to do on the field.

"I get really psyched up. I look forward to the day we play. There's no better feeling than sliding that uniform on your body and getting ready for battle. Even though it's hindered my life in some ways, it's given me more pride in myself to succeed in life.

"I've been through nine injuries and I'll go through more if I have to. Nothing is going to knock me down for a sport I have such a passion for."

From there, the battle for the mental edge ensued for both teams. The momentum shifted back and forth, but UMass came out on top in the first half with a 7–5 score.

Sophomore attacker Stephanie Walsh (14 goals on the season) and freshman Joanna Dignazio (20 goals) led the scoring, with two and three goals, respectively.

But what specifically came out of the first half was something on the negative side for the Minutewomen.

Halfway through one of the stalwarts on defense, sophomore Michelle Warrington, went down with a left knee injury.

She did come back in for a brief time, but was forced to the sidelines as the deep bruise left her in acute pain.

Before game time, Warrington was at the top of the list for UMass in ground balls picked up with 35, followed by her fellow former Ridley High teammates Erica Bryan (34) and Kristen Hocker (29).

The injury could be felt not by just her in this game; but the team as well.

"Without Michelle Warrington, we had a tough time in the middle and that hurt us," McClellan said. "That was clear today, and we do not have anybody that can truly replace her."

The second half opened well for the Minutewomen, as they took a 9–5 lead 7:50 into the period.

Two goals by Dignazio (5 goals on the day) put them ahead, and the momentum was in their favor.

But after scores for Hofstra by senior Melissa Compton and Costello, and a mishandled pass by goalie Kate Brew from Dignazio leading to another, the stage was set for the last second heartbreaker.

career at– bat, led off with a walk and then scored the game–winning run on a Chris Martens base hit.

Dani Ortega picked up her eighth victory of the season evening her record at 8–8. The sophomore gave up three hits, one earned run, struck out four while walking none.

Even though Cardenas' streak ended, another continued. Gutridge extended her hitting streak to 15 games by going 1–for–3 in the first game and 2–for–3 in the second tilt.

"I think the first game helped us focus. One of the problems that we have been having lately is really tearing it up in game one and going flat in game two," Sortino said. "So it was just the opposite today."

Next up for the Minutewomen is a doubleheader against New England rival Connecticut, on Thursday at 3 p.m. at Totman Field.

Fans, peers honor retiring Joe Montana

By Steve Wilstein
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Words and emotions and mawkish ceremonies are not Joe Montana's style.

Neither is quitting.

Bang him up and he'd bounce back. Give him the ball with a minute left and 90 yards to negotiate and he'd find a way to score. He left lesser mortals to figure out.

For two decades, from Notre Dame to the San Francisco 49ers to the Kansas City Chiefs, Montana played with a rare combination of grace and grit that made him not only a four-time Super Bowl champion but one of America's most beloved athletes.

He could do everything except give up, until now.

With his wife Jennifer and their four children at his side, with thousands of fans jamming an outdoor plaza to say goodbye on a cool, sunny Tuesday, Montana retired at age 38 in a nationally televised ceremony.

Looking youthful in a blue suit, his hair tousled by a breeze off San Francisco Bay, Montana thanked the crowd for their support as they chanted, "One more year, one more year..."

A few moments earlier, he had formally announced his retirement at a news conference in a nearby hotel.

Montana, who always had a joke ready even in the tensest moment on the field, told one as he stepped to the podium to say the words he said he thought he'd never say.

"I guess you all know why I'm here," he said with a smile. "I signed a new contract with the Kansas City Chiefs."

"I'm still healthy, I'm relatively in one piece. At this point, it's time to pull out the golf clubs," he said, pointing out that almost every season for years, people have speculated on his retirement. "One year they were going to be right," he said.

"It definitely felt like it was the right time," he added. "I don't know why, it felt like it was time to move on. I knew the day would have to come sometime, but it was also difficult to admit to myself that it was over."

Bill Walsh, the coach who guided him and goaded him to greatness, acted as master of ceremonies. Joining them were former Super Bowl teammates John Taylor, Ronnie Lott, Roger Craig, Steve Bono, Dwight Hicks and Dwight Clark, executives from the 49ers and Chiefs, friends and relatives.

Steve Young, the man who took Montana's job on the 49ers, wasn't invited. But if he felt snubbed, he didn't reveal it.

"I've had nothing but respect for Joe for years," Young said from his home on the eve of the ceremony. "Our relationship was kind of like an older brother, younger brother thing. In the backyard, we'd be competing hard, bloodying our noses, fighting for dominance. Look, let's face it, we both wanted the same job. We both wanted to play. We're competitors.

"But when the games came, we were always pulling for each other and working with each other. In all the years we were teammates, we never had an argument or even a cross word between us."

Calling Montana the greatest quarterback he'd ever seen, Young said the retirement announcement was an occasion to think about what Montana meant to football.

"It's a time for me to reflect on all those great moments when I was standing on the sidelines with my jaw open, staring at something impossible he'd just done," Young said. "I'd be completely amazed by the way he could find an open man, or see a crack in the defense, or take the team on some last-minute drive.

"There was no one who could do that like him, time after time."

Four NFL championships, three Super Bowl MVPs and an armful of records might be enough to qualify Montana as the best quarterback ever. For Young, Montana's legacy is broader.

"He taught me more than the nuts and bolts of football," Young said. "He taught me that you can go beyond your perceived capabilities and limits. You can go beyond what you or others think you can do. You can push yourself to another level."

Montana's comebacks from injuries — his medical chart is heavier than his football gear — and his escapes from seemingly lost situations gave him a larger-than-life image. In person, he has always been quiet and self-effacing, a rather average Joe in size and weight, strength and speed. He found words and emotions difficult to express. On Monday night, at dinner with his wife, agent and several aides to work out final details of the ceremony, Montana was nervous and typically quiet.

But when it came time to perform on the field, to win the big game with the big play, there was nobody cooler, nobody in greater command of himself and his teammates.

Montana had a way of scanning the field for receivers that was unmatched, his head turning from sideline to sideline, clicking off his primary target, his secondary target, his third or fourth targets, and throwing with uncanny accuracy to the one who was open.

"I saw that and tried to emulate that," Young said. "But until I played a year or two regularly I couldn't do that. That's why when I won the MVP in '92, and people were asking me if I'd reached the top of my game, I said, 'Not even close.' Watching Joe first hand, I saw the standards he set and what I would have to do to get there. It proved that not even an MVP trophy could fool you into thinking that you could be satisfied at that level."

Minutewomen takes weekend meet

Women's track record remains perfect with a 10-0 record

By Leigh Torbin
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's track and field team continued its winning ways by taking a five-way meet on Saturday at Llewelyn Derby Track, improving their unblemished record to 10-0.

The Minutewomen won the race with 113 points, followed by UMass–Lowell (81), Holy Cross (48), Providence College (39), and Hartford (1).

"I was very pleased with the team's performance," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "It was a funny meet. There were a lot of schools with strengths in different areas, but they weren't strung as a whole team."

UMass' competitors also did not have Nicole Roberts on their side. The junior from Troy, NY, amassed 21 points on the afternoon. Roberts won the 400 meters in 57.0 seconds, the fifth fastest time in school history, but she was hardly ready to call it a day. Roberts ran the third fastest 200 meters in school history (24.6), and anchored the first place 4 x 400 meter relay team as they finished with a season best time of 4:02.0.

If not for a faulty handoff, the Roberts–anchored 4 x 100 meter relay team would have placed first as well, instead of third, completing the race in a time of 52.9 seconds.

"Nicole surprised me with her performance," LaFreniere said. "The 4 x 100 was a total disaster, but coming back and doing so well in the 400 and then in the 200 was great. She had a fantastic day."

"There were a lot of schools with strengths in different areas, but they weren't strong as a whole team."

Christie Martin had a solid afternoon, as well. Martin won the hammer throw (141' 7") and the shot put (38' 2–1/4"), highlighting an overall weak day for UMass in the field. Tough cross–winds hindered results in many throwing events, especially the javelin, where Heather Brown's top throw was only 142' 4", well below her average. But it was enough to win the event. Shana Mitchell's winning 119' 6" discus throw was also below her average.

Kelly Liljeblad bounced back from an off weekend by qualifying for the ECAC Championships in the 5000 meters. Liljeblad flew past her competition, finishing in a time of 17:04.6.

Anya Forrest won the 100 meter hurdles in 14.8 seconds. Forrest banged her ankle on the seventh hurdle and the injury hampered her result, as she narrowly missed qualifying for the ECAC Championships. She was able to race through the pain though easily winning the race.

Silifa Kenku won the 400 meter hurdles in an impressive 66.2 seconds. Kenku contributed solidly all day as she also helped pace the 4 x 400 meter relay team to victory by running a strong leadoff leg.

Rebecca Donaghue captured a tight 800 meters in 2:15.2, but Providence College otherwise controlled the distance races, an area where they are a perennial power. Lady Friar runners took both the 1500 and 3000 meter races. Sue McMahon won the 3000 in an astounding 9:28, qualifying her for the NCAA Championships.

The Minutewomen will return to action on Saturday when they host the Big Green of Dartmouth and the New Hampshire Wildcats at 12:00 p.m. at Llewelyn Derby Track.

This will be the final home meet of the season and an important tune–up for the Penn Relays on April 27 and 28.

My brother's friend, Brad, just graduated from Harvard Business School. He got a job as a marketing consultant for a big drug rehabilitation center in Cleveland.
He figures he can increase their business by 30 to 40%. He'll target the potential customers with flyers in alley ways, messages on snow cone cups and hand outs at hospital emergency rooms.
Maybe,if things really start to hop, he'll arrange for some free trial "mini-kick-the-habit" weekend sleepovers!
But, he admits it could get tough. There just aren't enough junkies.
Anyway, that doesn't matter.....Brad suspects the real big money is in teenagers who have low self-esteem and smoke cigarettes.
He says their slogan could be:
"I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by low self-esteem."
Catchy ,huh?

WHAT THE HELL IS PLUMBAGA TRYING TO DO WITH THIS BOOK OF HIS? IS HE TRYING TO SUGGEST THAT VETS SHOULD FEEL FREE TO MAKE A TRAVESTY OF THE MORAL VALUES OF AMERICA?
STILL, MAYBE HE'S TRYING TO SUGGEST THAT WE DON'T HAVE TO LIVE WITH THE PAST. PERHAPS WE CAN THINK AND HEAL AND LET THE FEEL ME BIRDS FLY OVER OUR HEADS.

Minutewomen sweep CCSU

Gutridge extends hitting streak, Daut fans 12 in victories

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

A team coming into a doubleheader against the University of Massachusetts with a 8–22 overall record, wouldn't seem to stand much of a chance.

But Central Connecticut surprised the Minutewomen by sending the first game into extra innings before falling short, 2–1, UMass won the second game, 9–1.

"I told the kids that even though there record wasn't reflective of a national powerhouse that this was one of the biggest games on their schedule, and they always play us tough," Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino said. "I think we took them a little lightly, that's why we struggled."

The Minutewomen plated their first run of the game in the bottom of the second when Heather Darscy (1–for–3, one RBI) drove in Michele Shaw, who had reached on an error. The Blue Devils tied it up in the top of the fourth when Stacia Bendza smacked a base hit scoring Dawn Hankey, who had reached base with a hit.

UMass had a chance to end the game in the bottom of the seventh when Sam Cardenas came to the plate with Shaw on third and Tracey Osier (2–for–2) on second. The streaking third baseman, after going hitless in her first three attempts at the plate, had one final chance to extend her hitting streak to 22 games but grounded out to second base to end the inning.

"We have a lot of good players and there are going to be a lot of little goals, and there's going to be a lot of streaks on the line. These things are going to keep happening because that's the kind of players we have in the program," Sortino said. "But you know what? I'm sure that if you ask Sam, she'd much rather have won the ballgame than see a hitting streak go [on]."

The Minutewomen won the game in the bottom of the eighth when Kelly Buckley (1–for–2) ripped a two–out double and then scored on a Kim Gutridge base hit.

Kelly Daut went the distance giving up five hits and one earned run, while striking out a career–high 12 batters, to pick up her ninth straight victory in a row and improve her record to 16–5. She is extremely close to going under a 1.00 earned run average as her ERA currently stands at 1.02.

In the second game, the Minutewomen bats came alive resulting in a 9–1 thumping stopped after five innings because of the mercy rule.

UMass got one run in the first inning before breaking the game open in the second when four Minutewomen scored. Dorsey walked to start the inning, and Amy Powell and Osier followed with singles to load the bases. Cardenas then hit a sacrifice fly to right scoring both Dorsey and Powell. Stephanie Mareina (1–for–3, two runs scored) then ran out a grounder to shortstop for her only hit of the second game. Mareina stole second base and on the throw to second, which was bobbled, Osier was able to score. Mareina crossed the plate moments later on a Buckley (3–for–3) double in the hole between shortstop and third.

The Minutewomen added three more runs in the fourth when Osier, Cardenas (2–for–3, two RBIs, two runs scored) and Mareina all scored making it 8–1.

Minutemen blank Blue Devils at Lorden

By Brian Perillo
Collegian Staff

After having their 13–game winning streak halted by Duquesne in Pittsburgh this weekend, the University of Massachusetts baseball team rebounded to thrash Central Connecticut State 8–0 at Earl Lorden Field yesterday.

Central Conn.	0
Massachusetts	8

The Minutemen dominated on both sides of the ball, as senior left–hander Jeff Michaels hurled a gem, blanking the Blue Devils through eight innings. The offense exploded, scoring in five of the eight innings they batted in.

"We got good pitching, and runs throughout the ballgame," said Massachusetts coach Mike Stone. "We were always threatening."

Michaels (3–0, 3.16), usually the first baseman, started his fourth game of the season on the mound. The lefty gave up only four hits in eight innings while picking up the victory.

"I felt kind of stiff," Michaels said. "It was a good opportunity to go out there and see if I could have command without my velocity. I was able to get in a good groove."

Michaels allowed only one runner to reach third base, that in the first inning. He then held the Blue Devils hitless until the fifth inning, but was never in any real trouble.

"Michaels did well," said Stone. "It's nice to have solid performances from your 3–4–5 guys (in the rotation)."

Freshman right–hander Jeff Puleri mopped up in the ninth, giving up one single.

The UMass bats, which were relatively quiet this past weekend at Duquesne, came alive against CCSU's Kevin Browning, who saw his record drop to 0–4.

In the bottom of the first, designated hitter Nelson Ubaldo drew a two out walk, bringing up right–fielder Bill Knight. The senior promptly smacked a two–run dinger over the right–field fence. Knight's seventh long ball of the year, and 31st of his career, puts him within one homerun of the school's career mark.

UMass held a 2–0 lead when Knight came up to lead off the fourth, and drove another ball deep to right–field. This one bounced off the base of the wall, and he had to settle for a double. Knight came home on a fielder's choice to make it 3–0 Minutemen.

Massachusetts scratched out another run in the fifth when left–fielder Ryan Jette singled, stole second and advanced to third when the catcher's throw sailed into center field, and trotted home on a single by second baseman Muchie Dagliere.

In their half of the sixth, the Minutemen had their biggest offensive frame of the day. Catcher Andy Pelis started things off with a solo homer to right center field, his fourth of the year. UMass then got two more runs on three consecutive singles and a fielder's choice.

The final run came in the eighth when Paul Gautreau, a late inning replacement in left–field, singled off Blue Devil reliever Chris Reed to drive home first baseman Justin Kelly.

The Minutemen are in action again today at 3 p.m. Rhode Island comes to Amherst to make up an earlier rainout. Sophomore Chad Sullivan (0–0) will hurl for UMass.

Struggles make Murphy a success story

By Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

As Jeremy Murphy steps onto the field, he taps his left knee.

"Come on let's go, be good to me," he whispers toward the oft–injured joint. "Be good to me today."

Two hours later, Murphy leans over and kisses the fragile joint as he walks off the field. The left knee has survived another day, and the Massachusetts senior's lacrosse career lives on.

It has been that way for a while now. Since his junior college days at Herkimer Community College (N.Y.) Murphy has endured nine injuries, three surgeries and countless hours in the rehab room, all in hopes of continuing to play the sport he loves, hoping that today won't be his last.

At Herkimer, Murphy was a midfielder, who had begun dominating the junior college ranks. He scored four goals and an assist in the 1991 Junior College Championship.

Four games into his second season, he had 16 goals and 15 assists, and was considered a candidate for Player of the Year.

"I would have most likely been the Junior College Player of the Year. I had everything going for me," Murphy said. "In my mind I was unstoppable, which I think separated me from a lot of people."

Then it happened.

"I was playing against Hobart, running up the field, I was going to cut back," Murphy begins with a pained expression on his face. "I did a cut that I had done probably a thousand times, but when I cut my [anterior cruciate ligament] popped. Everyone in the stadium heard it pop.

"I can remember sitting on the field, saying to my coach 'This is my life coach. This is my life, I love this game, what am I going to do?'"

The coach comforted his star player, but Murphy's game was changed forever.

Murphy, according to Herkimer and current UMass teammate Vin Dello–Iacono, used to come to practice early and leave late, but had to trade the field for the rehab room.

"You're not in the rehab room with anyone else, you're there by yourself. It's only you that's going to pull you through, because no one really understands what's happening in there," Murphy said. "You ride the bike. You ice your leg down after practice. Before practice you have to sit in the tub for an hour by yourself.

"I get choked up when I talk about it, because I get really emotional. The mental anguish that you go through with any injury is 10 times the physical part to fighting back."

The once overflowing interest from Division I coaches diminished to almost nothing, adding to that anguish.

"A bunch of other schools had been looking, but the phone stopped ringing," Murphy said. "But Ted Garber, when he was here, said 'Hey it was just a knee injury. If you do the right thing you'll be back.' He really stuck with me. He kept me into my dream to play Division I lacrosse."

The rehab was successful, but the new Murphy had restrictions on his game. When Murphy headed to UMass, he had to adapt his game. No longer mobile enough to play midfield, he had to adjust to become an attackman.

Instead of moving in transition and setting up the offense, Murphy now has to rely on others to bring the offense to him.

"It really does bother me sometimes," Murphy said. "I think about it. It's very hard, when you were the creator, the dominator out there and you have to change you role.

"That's the difference with a lot of players who have injuries, who don't make it. They can't accept the fact that their role has to be changed and they have to become a different player."

After missing the 1993 season, Murphy made Garber's gamble look like a smart one, shining in his first three games at Massachusetts. But against Syracuse in the finals of the Fleet Bank Classic, the knee was injured again, sending the frustrated Murphy back to the training room.

Even when he did return, Murphy found himself shelved shortly after with another injury.

Women's lacrosse loses with seven seconds left

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Sometimes there are tough losses. Other times, there are just plain heartbreakers.

With seven seconds left in yesterday's game against Hofstra, the latter came to fruition for the University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (2–7).

Freshman midfielder Carol Ann Costello scored the winner off a penalty shot, as the Flying Dutchwomen narrowly defeated the Minute'women at Totman Field, 11–10.

UMass was unable to capitalize on a 10–7 lead with 7:17 left, as their ball control through the entire game was broken down by Hofstra (6–5).

For UMass coach Francesca McClellan, the experience gained for this young team (10 freshman out of 18 players), and the way they played the other 53 minutes, is the key lesson to get out of this game.

"I would rather lose a game like this than a game like Rutgers or Villanova," McClellan said. "Where in those games we did not even begin to play.

"We at least came out fighting, playing and following the game plan, things we have been really trying to do. In that respect, we did a good job."

In fact, that is what UMass exactly did in this game. From the opening tip, the game plan of controlled transitional passing through the midfield was evident.

Hofstra's defense came out of the gates a bit out of sync, as sophomore attacker Sarah Goddard quickly found out with a score 1:09 into the contest.

But after trading goals in the first seven minutes, Costello's first tally of the game for Hofstra knotted the game up.

Bomb rips open federal building; death toll rising

Explosion hits day care, killing over 10 children; firefighters search for survivors in wreckage

By Judy Gibbs
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — A car bomb ripped deep into America's heartland Wednesday, killing at least 26 people and leaving 300 missing in a blast that gouged a nine–story hole in a federal office building.

The dead included at least 12 youngsters, some of whom had just been dropped off by their parents at a day–care center. There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack, the deadliest U.S. bombing in 75 years.

At least 200 people were injured — 58 critically, according to Fire Chief Gary Marrs — and scores were feared trapped in the rubble of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building more than nine hours after the bombing.

The death toll was certain to rise.

"Our firefighters are having to crawl over corpses in areas to get to people that are still alive," Assistant Fire Chief Jon Hansen said.

Attorney General Janet Reno refused to comment on who might have been behind the attack. President Clinton called the bombers "evil cowards," and Reno said the government would seek the death penalty against them.

Their clothes torn off, victims covered in glass and plaster emerged bloodied and crying from the building, which looked as if a giant bite had been taken out of it, exposing its floors like a dollhouse.

Cables and other debris dangled from the floors like tangled streamers in a scene that brought to mind the car bombings at the U.S. Embassy and Marine barracks in Beirut in 1983.

"I dove under that table," said Brian Espe, a state veterinarian who was giving a slide presentation on the fifth floor. "When I came out, I could see daylight if I looked north and daylight if I looked west."

Mayor Ron Norick said the blast, which left a crater 30 feet long and 8 feet deep, was caused by a car bomb. He said the car had been outside, in front of the building.

"Obviously, no amateur did this," Gov. Frank Keating said. "Whoever did this was an animal."

Police Sgt. Bill Martin said at least 26 people were killed, 12 of them children.

Earlier in the day, paramedic Heather Taylor said 17 children were dead at the scene, a figure later disputed by police. Dr. Carl Spengler, one of the first doctors at the scene, said the children, all at the day–care center, ranged in age from 1 to 7, and some were burned beyond recognition.

Reno said 300 people were unaccounted for by late afternoon. About 20 of 40 children in the day–care center were missing.

The explosion, similar to the terrorist car bombing that killed six people and injured 1,000 at New York's World Trade Center in 1993, occurred just after 9 a.m., when most of the more than 500 federal employees were in their offices.

The blast could be felt 30 miles away. Black smoke streamed across the skyline, and glass, bricks and other debris were spread over a wide area. The north side of the building was gone. Cars were incinerated on the street.

People frantically searched for loved ones, including parents whose children were in the building's day–care center.

Christopher Wright of the Coast Guard, one of those helping inside the building, said rescuers periodically turned off their chainsaws and prying tools to listen for pleas for help, "but we didn't hear anything — just death."

"You're helpless really, when you see people two feet away, you can't do anything, they're just smashed," he said.

"We're talking to victims who are in there and reassuring them that we're doing everything within the good Lord's power to reach them and get to them," the Fire Department's Hansen said. "It's going to be a very slow process."

Easing tensions: The story of two roommates

By Chris Conner
and Jacob W. Michaels
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This article is the last in a series of three.

Although relations are strained at times between black and Jewish student groups on the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus, the two communities are not consistently at each other's throats.

Maydad Cohen, a Jewish student, and William Peets, a Black student, have been roommates for the last two years, evidence that not all has gone awry between the two groups.

Initial impressions

The two students met mostly by luck, according to Cohen, whose first roommate failed to arrive at school, and Peets, who was not assigned a room originally, was paired with Cohen.

Cohen hails from a predominantly White neighborhood in Brookline, Ma., while Peets is a native of a Bronx, N.Y. sector primarily populated by Blacks.

Initially, Cohen said he was skeptical about the relationship that he and his new roommate might share, but soon found that their shared interests outweighed their apparent differences.

"We're just both very serious about our schoolwork and we enjoy the same things," Cohen said.

Cohen described their current relationship as "very friendly" and "comfortable."

"I think we both have an understanding of how we both work," Cohen said. "You can't know someone all the way through. We can both stay in the room quiet, or we'll both talk or whatever."

Morgan State transfer Peets, a junior electrical engineering major, concurred with Cohen.

"We're friends," he said. "Sometimes we play basketball. We eat at the DCs. We get along more than just roommates."

Roommates without tension

Cohen, a sophomore political science and history major, said that the effects of the Black–Jewish conflict have never been an issue with he and Peets.

"It's weird that I haven't felt [the tensions]," he said. "I hear that there are some."

Peets also said that he remained unaffected by the tensions which have split the Black and Jewish communities at times, offering his belief on the issue.

"Everyone's entitled to their own opinions and those opinions don't make you a good or bad person," he said. "All of those are an aside.

"Maydad's a person and I'm a person. That doesn't mean we can't disagree about it. I think it's understood we're going to disagree."

Finding solutions

Cohen and Peets have a different perspective on how solutions to the tensions can be found.

"I think discussions are the only way," Cohen said. "If you take the time to really talk to [people] and understand and ask questions then you'll be able to find some solutions."

Both roommates agreed that they had benefitted from living together.

"I don't think I learned anything," Peets said. "I always judge people individually."

"All it did was open my eyes more," Cohen said. "He's the first Black person I've ever really known so I didn't get to see this whole different perspective before. I'm from this mostly White neighborhood and he's from the Bronx, and how he sees us, you don't get that perspective from other White Jews."

Speaker challenges female stereotypes

By Laura Schmidt

Challenging the traditional feminist stereotypes is the game plan for the Third Wave Direct–Action Corporation.

The Distinguished Visitors Program of the University of Massachusetts sponsored a lecture by Rebecca Walker entitled "The Third Wave of Feminism," Tuesday evening in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Walker founded the non–profit organization devoted to youth activism for social change.

Under this corporation, Freedom Summer 92 was organized and succeeded in spreading the word to national media about the power of the female, low–income and of– color vote, Walker said.

"I have founded the Third Wave, traveled around the country challenging feminist stereotypes and envisioning a more inclusive and less dogmatic politics," Walker said.

She said one of the stereotypes within the feminist struggle is that of the ideal woman.

"My personal ideal was the brilliant and politically empowered woman. She is knowledgeable and is prohibitively skeptical of political power within the current system."

"This ideal warrior woman, aside from being a model, was also a curse," said Walker.

"As I constantly measured myself against the warrior woman's confident generosity and non–competitive ways, I found myself lacking."

She said that she, like many other women, often do want a traditional domestic life, do want to make money, and do want political and cultural power.

"I began to see the benevolent warrior woman as another role, not of her own making, which she would have to deconstruct in order to be fully free to create herself as a woman," she said.

Walker said becoming your own woman or man is the choice of each of us as distinct individuals. She added that becoming your own woman is not easy.

"The state we are all in right now — of coming to consciousness about our responsibility and power as women and men with options in the world — is actually the crucial state of becoming," Walker said.

"There is an increase in right wing attacks, from Rush Limbaugh for example, who came out to either bash feminists by calling us Nazi's or to bash all women by minimizing our access to the rights we deserve like the right to privacy and self–determination," Walker said. "When energy is high, we young people need to figure out which struggles we want to fight, and with what tools."

Aside from being your own woman, Walker said feminism is also about recognizing discriminations towards all races, people of color and the choice of one's lover.

"It was nice to see a fresh face up there talking about something that I could identify, especially with Walker being a woman of color," said sophomore Richa Kaul.

In her closing remarks, Walker said to the students, "I wish you the best of luck on your journeys and hope when we look back we will have all done work we're proud of to improve the world in which we all live together."

What if Gina Grant came to UMass?

Marni E. Helfner

What would happen if Gina Grant applied to UMass? Would she encounter the same problems that she'd dealing with regarding Harvard? I doubt it.

Grant is the young woman who was featured in an article in The Boston Globe Sunday Magazine about teens who beat the odds. She is a senior honors student at Cambridge Rindge and Latin, tutors underprivileged youth, lives in her own apartment, pays her own bills and was accepted to Harvard on an early decision program.

She also pleaded no contest to a charge of bludgeoning her abusive mother to death.

Grant neglected to inform The Globe and Harvard of this information. But she didn't have to. Because the incident occurred when she was a juvenile, the moment she turned 18 her records became sealed.

Someone sent Harvard and The Globe newspaper clippings regarding the death of Grant's mother and her involvement in the murder. Harvard rescinded her early admission and didn't further state whether she could apply for regular admission.

Harvard has come up with a variety of excuses as to why they revoked the offer of early admission. First they said that they wouldn't admit her because she didn't answer the question regarding criminal offenses. Next, they said she lied in her interview. Most recently, they said she didn't answer a specific interview question regarding the death of her mother.

Grant thought she didn't have to reveal any information because her record was sealed.

She has remained silent with the exception of a lone press release saying she didn't want to stir up an old controversy.

But the question still remains — would UMass have accepted Gina Grant? Could we admit someone whose records were sealed, but we knew they had a past? At what point do we draw the line on who is safe and who isn't?

I asked around and got quite a few responses. My friend Matt said, "She wouldn't have any problem getting in to UMass if she played for the basketball team."

Jon, another friend, commented, "If her records were sealed, UMass would let her in — everyone deserves a second chance."

A different Matt said, "There's no way UMass would accept her. It's such a touchy subject, people get upset over the smallest thing — and somebody would get upset. It would be a lot of bad public relations for the University."

All these different opinions made me wonder a little bit more — what do admissions and legal services have to say about it? Could UMass legally admit or deny Grant admission because of an incident that happened when she was a juvenile?

I contacted Arlene Cash, director of undergraduate admissions, to get her opinion was on the subject. Cash said that on the University application, applicants are asked if they have ever been suspended or on probation, and if they answer yes, then they need to explain further.

"If there was a concern that a student we admitted might be a danger to others or themselves, we would refer that case to Dean of Students. And if that meant support services for the student like special housing arrangements, or counselling, they would handle that," commented Cash.

She referred me to the News Office and I was told that applicants are considered on an individual case basis, and that it wasn't up to the University to make a decision regarding Grant because it didn't directly involve them.

Would UMass accept Gina Grant? My guess is yes. As a state university committed to public education for all, UMass has an obligation to give people a chance for an education. What people did as juveniles has no relevance when they are adults. Obviously, Grant was a one time criminal, who would probably never commit another crime — so what's the point in punishing her further? Give her the second chance she so desperately deserves.

UMass gave me a second chance too. I left my mother's abusive home a month after I turned 17. I moved around and eventually wound up in a homeless shelter. I turned my life around and found a place to live, got a job, and went to community college. I graduated with a degree in liberal arts and applied to UMass and Smith College. Smith turned me down — but UMass took me without blinking.

Had I stayed with my mom, had I not turned my life around, had I not gotten accepted to UMass, I never would have been in the position I am in now. More than likely, I would be living on the streets of New York, a ward of the state and generally more worse off than I ever imagined.

All it took was one person, along each step of the way, to believe in me and understand that I was looking for a second chance.

Gina Grant just needs that one person and that one second chance.

Pulling the plug on our thoughts

Nathan Crick

The Bluewall had become a haven from the rain. More people than I had ever remembered being there crowded around the tables and talked in mellowed tones in the thickened air. Yet what created more than the immediate atmosphere was, oddly enough, the television. The screen crackled with the static from mobile news cameras, and the weary faces of bloodied survivors mixed with fast talking journalists who seemed almost shaken.

What was most amazing was that people walking by stopped as they neared the platform of tables. Some would walk up the steps and lean on the railing for a while, only to be replaced by more when they left. Nobody talked and instead just stood quietly as the scenes played themselves out. One woman brought up a tray of food to her friend in front of the television, asking loudly what happened, but she, too, quickly settled down and was quiet.

When the television becomes a stage for the human tragedy and even serves as a subtle means of inspiration — the mind of Americans actually seems to raise itself. I have seen the eyes of soap operas, and in them is a brain that drones and mumbles to itself. It seems that this is the state we have grown accustomed to. Plugging ourselves into the outlet and letting the screen play out our thoughts.

The explosion in the federal building in Oklahoma City was real, however. The views were not prepackaged and mailed to us, and the commentators were not quick to give us the script for our response. The people I saw had something behind their eyes and I could see things moving around, searching out memories and ideas to connect to. Reality tends to do that, I have found. When the world is plainly laid out on a table, and we can go and poke it and examine it, things tend to happen inside.

As I watched this scene, I really began to get a picture of just what this country can be. We have so much power, and so much potential, but we have no idea what to do with it. We are like millions of little children tending a huge pressure cooker that has no particular purpose. We build up all this energy and don't know what to do with it. Instead of using it to make something productive, we blow if off with our safety valves, like entertainment or warfare, to keep us from exploding from boredom.

When something happens that is real, that sparks something within us either to act or at the very least to think, I can almost feel the incredible motion of the nation start to generate something productive for a few precious moments. It almost makes me believe that we have something great that lies ahead of us, if we could only realize all that we have already left behind us in our apathy and laziness.

This sickness is so pervasive, though, that I know even the power of this event will not stay with us. I could see it already on the news, when they went to Boston to interview the mayor concerning the evacuation of a federal building there because of a bomb threat. After describing the work that had to be done getting people out and then not finding a bomb, the reporter commented "and it's such a waste of taxpayer's money."

Soon we will be wrapped up in placing the blame on the people who committed the bombing, and will again focus our attention on releasing the safety valve in the form of our anger. The mayor went on to say bitterly, "putting a bomb near a daycare center. How sick can you be?"

Indeed, it is disturbing. It is as disturbing as the images in Iraq when the women were pulled out of the bomb shelter we destroyed. It is as disturbing as the children in Vietnam that we Napalmed. It is as disturbing as the thousands of families in the country that we leave in poverty in the ghettoes and on the street. It is as disturbing as any of the realities that we impose upon others and on ourselves. The world, in fact can be a very sick place but we never seem to realize we are just as much a part of that world as anyone else.

Maybe when the cameras go to our own streets and to our own living rooms and find there the slow and much more painful death of our country and our culture, we will say the same thing. We will pause in our speech and realize what we are becoming, and what we are letting ourselves become, and then we'll shut off the valves, and stop wasting it all away.

Opinion/Editorial

Don Juan de Bryce?

Don Juan de Bryce

I recently sat through the film Don Juan de Marco for the hour and 40 minutes, chuckling to myself. The movie was spent trying to figure out if this guy in the movie, a character played by Johnny Depp who was in a psychiatric ward, was really the infamous Don Juan, the self–proclaimed World's Greatest Lover. I laughed throughout the film, since I knew he wasn't.

Because I am.

Why, I am Don Juan de Bryce. I am the world's greatest lover. Let me explain.

I was conceived in nineteen hundred and seventy four in El Seekonk, a small island off the coast of Espana. Born to Jaime, a teacher at the Universidad, and Catalina, a model, I was blessed to be in a beautiful family. In El Seekonk, we were voted La Familia Mas Bonita de Todas by the townspeople when I was an infant. I grew up in an affectionate household, with lots of kissing and hugging.

When I was in grade school, masses of girls would line up at recess to kiss me. I tried to play bombardment or kickball with the rest of the boys, but it was a difficult task. One time, we were playing football and I was tackled hard on a running play from behind. I looked up after the hit, and it wasn't the guys who tackled me. It was a swarm of girls kissing me all over.

Even in indoor recess, which we had because of bad weather, girls would take me in the coat room and try to kiss me. I didn't mind the kissing and hugging, but I did miss out on some good games of 7–UP.

Throughout grade school, all the girls would choose me when a group activity was being done in class. Girls would fight with each other, pinching and scratching just to be near me. It was awful. I have to admit, though, I was flattered when girls had blood trickling from their nose after decking somebody for me. It turned me on.

One time in sixth grade, there was a girl sitting next to me in the cafeteria. She began to caress my leg underneath the table. I slowly grabbed her hand, walked her behind the playground outside, and began to kiss her passionately.

She fainted after a couple of minutes of necking, an ambulance was called and I spent the next week in the principal's office. They said it was because I left the building during school, but I believe that the woman teacher who turned me in was jealous. She had made passes at me each day, but I backed off every time because my father got into a load of trouble when he hooked up with a teacher in his school days.

In junior high, I would get mobbed at the dances, so bad that there was extra security at the door. I was forced to dance on the corner of the stage, away from the band that played, and the girls would form a line.

In high school, it all continued. I could not even attempts to attend the dances at my high school because it would get out of hand. Yet, not going didn't work because the dances would be cancelled. It turned out each time a dance was scheduled, the girls refused to go. The night of the first dance, a line of cars were parked outside of my house, waiting for me to go out that night.

I can remember that night vividly, as that marked the first night I wore my mask. I put on the mask that bordered my eyes, ran out the back door with a few select ladies, and went to the movies. That was the first, and last, time I had my own privacy. It was nice.

But when I got home that night, the girls had surrounded my house. They noticed me sneaking by, and rushed at me. The mask was ripped off, along with several threads of my clothes. By the time the group of girls left, my face was smeared with lipstick.

Now, I am in college. I have attempted to stay low key. I am trying to avoid the spotlight. I tend to dress down purposely, and wear a hat and sunglasses each day to cover my face. I am still romantically linked to several women, but I am not bothered as much as in the past.

I am only 20 years of age, and yet I have been with about one ... hundred thousand girls/women in my short lifetime. What can I say? I am a romantic. I long for gently caressing a woman's body, of kissing a woman's neck, of nibbling on a woman's earlobes. I am amazed by the beauty of a woman, and I have yet to encounter anything in this world that is lovelier. That is why I can tolerate the love and lust women shower me with each and every day.

Women adore me, and I them, too.

That is what makes me the World's Greatest Lover. I hear shouts of Romeo, Casanova, Rudolph Valentino, Julio Iglesias and Wilt Chamberlain.

But to those who say they are the greatest lovers, I beg to differ. Close your eyes slowly and put yourself in my shoes. Imagine that you are me, Don Juan de Bryce, the object of every woman's desires. Feel the emotion of the World's Greatest Lover, from birth through schooling to the present.

Then, you will agree.

Don Juan de Bryce is not a Collegian columnist, but an imaginary character created by Andrew Bryce, who himself is a Collegian columnist.

Notes from the Basement

Arthur Stapleton, Jr.

Is it just me, or is this thing about choosing our commencement speaker all too easy for the University? Think about it. No offense to Anthony Lake, this year's selection, or 1994's John Edgar Wideman, but these people have affiliations with our school and the Five–College Area.

Whatever happened to bringing outsiders in, to shed some new light on our situation. Lake is very prestigious as one of the top advisors for the President. I'm sure he has plenty of stories to tell the undergraduates on May 28, about his trips from Hadley to Washington, D.C.

The fact remains, though, he taught at this institution. It couldn't have been too difficult for those higher–ups who chose Lake to speak — he's been here before, he'll come if we ask him. Well, doesn't that seem like the easy way out?

I shudder to think what goes on during this process of finding ... "hmmm, who can we get with one phone call? Nah, we couldn't possibly get anyone to come to this pitiful place we call a school for commencement."

That's the feeling I get. Hell, why aim high when we know we're going to get shot down? While on the subject of recruiting commencement speakers, maybe Michael Hooker should put John Calipari on the committee, despite his bad luck on the hunt for new talent thus far in 1995. Then again, I'm surprised that Calipari wasn't chosen as the speaker.

Don't worry, if they call me next year to speak for the class of '96, I'll decline. I promise — unless they give me a wad of cash.

It's not one of my hang–outs, but there have been plenty of posers in the Cape Cod Lounge attempting to impersonate Billy Joel. Let me explain — they ain't no Piano Men. One of the most annoying things when you are trying to study is listening to an aspiring musician pound on the keys to the tune of "Chopsticks." Or, even worse, "Heart and Soul." Ya know, the song from Big.

Here's a hint — if you want to play the piano, give UPC a call. I've heard they are still looking for acts for Spring Concert. Other than that, save your tickling of the ivories for 9 o'clock on a Saturday, when the regular crowd shuffles in.

I guess you could say people here at the University are getting stuck in the past — or at least they are trying to relive it.

I couldn't make the '70s bash, because I left my afro wig and Led Zeppelin shirt at home. However, I plan to make the '80s get–together this weekend. I have my blue parachute pants with black zippers all ready to go.

The one thing I can't figure out, though, is where I'm going to put the big sheet of cardboard for the breakdancers. I can do a mean worm.

Hope for good weather this weekend. Haigis Hoopla is one of the best weekends of the year at the University and you may want to check it out.

Plus, I'll be captaining the Daily Collegian team. We think we have a shot at the media title. We're like any other team that has entered the tourney — out of shape, can't hit a jump shot and will probably be hungover on game day. One of my teammates is a shoe–in for "SportsCenter," when he runs to the sidelines and grabs his inhaler.

Hey, if the basketball's not good, the free t–shirts are.

AREA PROFESSORS, CRITICS & CINEPHILES PICK

THE BEST

Frederico Fellini's 8 1/2

FOREIGN FILMS

Akira Kurosawa's The Seven Samurai

By Jon Lupo & Martin Brown
Collegian Staff

Due to the success of last semester's Best American Films sampling, the Collegian Arts & Living desk decided to broaden horizons with this new film poll. In addition to surveying area critics, professors and notable cinephiles for their picks for the best foreign films, we also asked them to list five of their favorites — thereby attempting to delineate between what a jury member weighed as "best" to what s/he considered their favorites.

Our criteria for "foreignness" depended solely on the films' being generally considered non-American. Works from Canada and Great Britain, then, were included. The films need not necessarily be in a foreign language.

To check out individual lists, see the jury box on the upper right hand corner of this page. Films are ranked in descending order; the top choice was awarded 10 points, the next nine points, and so on, down to the last, with one point. Favorite films are listed in no particular order.

1. M

Fritz Lang looked into the heart of darkness with this 1931 stunner, blending truly hypnotic visuals with a brilliantly asynchronous soundtrack that keeps us precariously off- balance. Peter Lorre — forever typecast but eerily magnificent — plays a child murderer whose crimes are so heinous that both the cops and the crooks are looking for him, the latter eventually branding him with the letter "M."

Haunting and exasperating — it's like spending a couple of hours in a sweatbox ... in the desert — M works to make Lorre both sympathetic and monstrous, a victim and perpetrator of his murderous compulsions. Though equal parts pitch black satire, social melodrama and obsessive thriller, M is summed up neatly and horrifically as Lorre hums "Peer Gynt" as he goes in for the kill. But when he's cornered by the crooks, the only sound he can make is a hopeless scream. The thing is, nobody's listening. (J.L.)

2. Rules of the Game

While 1939 Hollywood was cranking out classics like Gone With the Wind and The Wizard of Oz, French director Jean Renoir was detailing nothing less than the decline of bourgeois civilization. Chronicling a country weekend in a France that's teetering on the edge of World War II, Renoir conducts this distinctly uncomic comedy of manners with poetic grace and prickly pessimism.

The "game" finds its most tragic and bitter realization in the elaborately staged rabbit hunt — a symphony of elegant horror so unnerving it contributed to the film's failure with critics and audiences alike. It was not until the '50s and '60s that Rules reigned finally as an international masterpiece. (J.L.)

3. La Grande Illusion

Renoir again, pre-Rules but nonetheless triumphant. What's special in this pacifist fable of World War I French prisoners in a German POW camp is how stylistic it is without being flashy. Renoir uses visual and auditory motifs as symbols that are as emotionally stirring as they are intellectually challenging.

Renoir draws us in with an anti-war/class struggle and turns it into something ultimately more affecting: a morality play and social critique where the rules of the game — including the very language and national identity — are embodied with a acute force that's a wonder to behold. According to Renoir, the story is true; told to him by friends in the war, the film maneuvers from realism to mood piece from shot to shot yet still remains a potent metaphor for the rebuilding of European society. (J.L.)

4. 8 1/2

The plot of 8 1/2 is simple enough — a film about the creation of a film. This is Frederico Fellini's brilliant (self?) portrayal of a director trying to come up with an idea for s movie. Fears, dreams and irresolutions make him more and more neurotic as he tries to find redemption through vocation, women and the church. Each fails him; each leads him back to himself; each negatively prepares him for the moment of epiphany at the end of the film.

Visually, Fellini's striking style of cinematography is so engaging that Marcello Mastroianni's superb performance could have been lost. It is not. Mastroianni struts his role as the director so well, that only after the film is over do we realize how complicated his character really is. One of the first movies to look at sexual relationships intelligently and knowingly, 8 1/2 is a funny, poignant and profound statement on the craziness of life. (M.B.)

The Seven Samurai

There should be a rite of passage after watching this Akira Kurosawa masterpiece. When the film ends one feels transformed to a new level of understanding of what it means to live.

Simply put, the final battle sequence may be the most powerful such scene ever depicted in all of film. As s monsoon rains pour down upon the village and surrounding countryside, seven samurai take a stand with a collective of desperate farmers

"I was kind of a runty thing. And I liked to hang out with the girls. That annoyed the boys. So every day after school, they would throw me over the edge of the parking lot and roll me into the weeds. Eventually my beatings were so inevitable that I'd just go to the lot and wait."

Ever wonder if some "good" things are worth celebrating? Case in point: Sarah Jessica Parker who was chosen by Howard Stern to play his wife Alison in the autobiographical movie Private Parts. Parker's people haven't agreed to sign anything until they have read the script. Smart move.

Can "Melrose Place" survive without reigning bitch Amanda Woodward? Rumor has it that although Heather Locklear signed on for another season her character's miraculous recovery from cancer may end in 1996. Why? Well Locklear is spreading her wings and moving to the silver screen. Two projects under consideration are the Cohen Brother's Intolerable Cruelty and Joel Silver's Executive Decision.

And while on the subject the season will end with Kimberly plotting to blow up Melrose Place and Billy–I– Wear–Jeans–To–Work marrying Brooke–I–Can't–Choose–Who–To–Spy–On. Also joining the cast for six episodes will be soap star Patrick Muldoon as a fashion company CEO with the hots for Jane.

Disney has decided to go from cartoon to reality with a remake of 101 Dalmatians using real live dogs (as opposed to dead, fake or stuffed ones). Meryl Streep is the front- runner for the role as the evil Cruella DeVil.

Brad Pitt was shamed into cleaning up after he appeared on Newsweek's cover entitled "You're Going Out in That?" The world's sexiest man hurried to a chic Los Angeles's clothing store where he purchased $15,000 worth of chic apparel and according to a salesperson "lots of Calvin Klein underwear." However, Pitt's spokespeople deny he did it to rebuke the cover image saying that Pitt always dresses beautiful — the photographer just didn't catch him at the right moment.

Sly Stallone's fiance Angie Everhart is moving up in the world. She is slated to play opposite David Caruso in Jade. She plays a high class call girl.

Is there no end to the smount of stupidity in this country? Brian "Kato" Kaelin despite his less than impressive testimony on the stand is more popular than ever. TV Food Network

Somewhere between a labor of love and TV dinners, cooking became a chore. Whipping up a meal meant reaching for the can opener or lovingly embracing the freezer door. Well not any more. Americans everywhere have discovered the joy of cooking, not just as s means of providing nutrients to other carbon units — but as an art form. Julia Childs, Jacques Pippin and Jeffery Smith have helped move the nation towards this divine pleasure.

The Food Network is another instrument devoted to this pleasurable art form and if you love food this is the channel for you. From simple sauces to glittering meringue pies topped with grated bittersweet chocolate, this is the station for cooks of all levels. It's something for everyone and you can never be bored. Watch it, drool and maybe head for the kitchen inspired to do great things with egg whites. Impress family and friends and say you owe it all to television.

Album Portastatic

Good news for fans eagerly anticipating the next Superchunk album, Merge Records has recently released the new EP from Superchunk frontman Mac McCaughen's side project Portastatic. Thankfully though, Scrapbook isn't another one of those tired "solo acoustic" forums; Mac sings and plays all the instruments on the five–song EP.

Scrapbook's greatest schievement is undoubtedly "St. Elmo's Fire," on which Mac accomplishes the stunning and seemingly oxymoronic feat of performing a Brian Eno cover that is beautiful and yet faithful to the original (right down to the cheezy keyboard effects). The other tracks on the disc include the tongue–in–cheek guitar heroics of "Why Pinch Yourself" and the subtle charm of "A Bear That Chokes" (a song that would have been right at home on Superchunk's Foolish LP). All in all, Scrapbook far surpasses Portastatic's previous efforts and is a must for any fan of Mac's distinctive song craft.

Show Tuscadero

Tonight at Hampshire College two of today's finest underground bands will take the stage for what should surely be a pure pop extravaganza.

While Tuscadero and Lorleli have little in common despite their penchant for sweet pop hooks, both bands have been making a buzz for themselves in the music world.

Tuscadero, after a series of 7" singles, recently put out their debut release The Pink Album on TeenBeat Records (owned by ex–Unrest frontman Mark Robinson who discovered the band) and subsequently won the hearts of critics everywhere with their brash, yet adorable, stripped–down–to–the–barest–of–bones tunes.

Lorleli, while not as overtly childish as Tuscadero, also has a penchant for fragile songwriting, and has put out singles on Slumberland Records. They were also featured on the label's compilation Why Popstars Can't Dance which came out last year.

Richter makes splash in Late Night world

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — His office door at NBC headqusrters says "Telly Savalas," but, no, there's not a shred of doubt the occupant is really Andy Richter, all 28 years and six feet, two inches of him, relaxing after a "Late Night" taping.

Who loves ya, baby?

You'd be surprised. Hefty and moon-faced, definitely not born to run, Richter may be the last of a dying breed: the couch-stationed talk-show sidekick. That couch, of course, is at the right hand of red-haired, even taller Conan O'Brien, who inherited "Late Night" from David Letterman in September 1993.

Back then, before the O.J. Simpson trial made instant celebrities of half the population of Los Angeles, both O'Brien and Richter seemed remarkable for their abrupt, TV-generated fame.

All the more remarkable was the pounding Richter took from critics, who singled him out for many of "Late Night's" perceived sins.

No sweat, says Richter, recalling those early days with something not unlike pleasure: "It was exciting even to be on TV and have bad reviews written about you."

Fortunately, that brand of excitement is mostly behind him.

Just mark the thundering chant of the audience in Studio 6A when Richter is introduced: "An-DEE! An-DEE!"

"Hear the praise of fans like Cynthia Gill.

"What's great about Andy is, when he does something, you really notice," says Gill, who edits a monthly "Late Night with Conan O'Brien" fanzine from her home in Canon City, Colo. "Andy's not just a yes-man. When he needs to, he can shine."

And consider the ratings. Not spectacular, but, hey, up 6 percent over last season's, and averaging 1.8 million households since January (against 1.5 million for its CBS challenger at 12:35 a.m. weeknights, "The Late Late Show with Tom Snyder").

"A show like ours is all referential to something we've done before," Richter says, "so I can see why in our first few weeks people would turn us on and go, 'What the hell is this?'

"We just needed a little time. Like with a friendship — you laugh at things your friends say because you know 'em."

Bits that crack up "Late Night" cognoscenti (and leave others just shaking their heads) include "Things We Didn't Get to Make Fun Of," "In the Year 2000," "Staring Contest," "Andy Richter's Self-Help Tapes" and, of course, "Right Side-Wrong Side" — during which viewers playing the Official "Late Night" Drinking Game get to take a swig each time Conan calls Andy "the spawn of Satan." Cheers!

By all indications not the spawn of Satan, the oddly cherubic Richter grew up in Yorkville, Ill., outside Chicago.

After film school and a stretch as a production assistant for TV commercials, he enrolled in an improvisation class. "But not to get into Second City and then move on to 'Saturday Night Live,'" he cautions. "I just felt, this would be fun."

It was, and so was playing Mike Brady onstage in "The Real Brady Bunch" and joining Chris Elliott in his film Cabin Boy.

Then, in Los Angeles two short years ago, Richter was filling out job applications when he got a phone call from New York.

"Getting hired for 'Late Night,'" he says gratefully, "saved me from interviewing to be an assistant manager at a movie theater in Westwood."

Now, he gets to be the assistant, if you will, to Conan. "I get to be the guy on the couch. I also get to be s sketch-comedy performer, I also get to be the smart-ass Ed Bradley type and tape remote bits, shoving a mike into people's faces at the Miss America pageant or the NBA Finals."

And after all that, he gets to go home to his wife of one year, writer-actress Sarah Thyre, with whom he hopes to have children "and a really nice family life."

"I have a great job," he says, but sounding very Andy, adds, "to me it's still a job. And if there were some horrible power failure which meant we couldn't do the show one day and we had to put on a rerun, I'd say, 'Ahhhh, that's too bad.'"

Sci–fi phenomenon moving at warp speed

I must admit, I've never really been a devotee of science fiction television. Seeing actors in weird alien costumes, strutting around talking about hydraulic chambers, intergalactic warfare and other real important futuristic stuff just doesn't do much for me for some reason.

Still, you don't have to be Dr. Spock to realize that sci–fi is big this year. Not only do we have three of four syndicated versions of "Star Trek" to choose from, but now there's also a slew of efforts courtesy of the Fox network that are specifically designed to meet all of our various techno–dramatic needs.

Clearly, Fox's cult hit "The 'X' Files," outshines the rest of the sci–fi field in terms of establishing an appropriately creepy mood and darkly comic atmosphere. This show is like "The Twilight Zone" with attitude — as stars David Duchovny and Gillian Anderson investigate unexplained and absurd occurrences while still maintaining unflappably cool dispositions. Amazingly, it doesn't buckle under the weight of polysyllabic jargon, or dissolve into a silly, predictable romance between the two leads.

And by not falling into the trap of becoming too technically garbled or maudlin, "'X' Files" wisely stays focused on its strange stories, and the discoveries of strange rituals and paranormal activity are allowed to unfold with a minimum of needless distractions.

Unfortunately, two of Fox's latest sci–fi efforts are less successful at creating absorbing situations and well–defined characters. "VR5" starts out with the intriguing idea of building its controversies around the theme of virtual reality, but ultimately ends up being less provocative than it should be. The set–up, involving Lori Singer (of "Fame" fame) as a computer nerd who helps a secret organization solve mysteries in cyberspace, isn't bad — but somehow I expected more of a sense of wonder behind the notion of entering alternate worlds.

Here, it's just sort of a gimmick — something to hang plot threads on, and something through which we discover lots of unnecessary information about Singer's character. She's not as hip as one might hope, but she fits the geek role pretty well — and the writing is suitable enough to warrant a second look.

"Sliders," on the other hand, seems to be only seconds away from self–destruction. It's a slapstick retread of "Quantum Leap," featuring a bunch of dorks who use what appears to be a remote control to pass through parallel time tracks. Frankly, though, I was surprised that this group could even figure out how to use it — not having a lot of technical talk is one thing, but not having characters who seem even halfway intelligent is something else. This is a lame sitcom in sci–fi disguise. I don't know how else to explain why, in one episode, some punk resembling a Pauly Shore groupie ended up being revered as a scientific genius. But I should probably keep that plot twist in perspective, after all, compared to everybody else on the show, he very well could have been the most advanced.

But enough about that. This month a few lucky shows are getting one last shot at attracting viewers before the plug is pulled, including CBS' aggressively pure and innocent drama "Christy." Starring Kellie Martin as a young schoolteacher encountering love, fulfillment and an annoying abundance of wholesomeness, it was resurrected primarily because of an outpouring of support from fans. But while I can appreciate its potential to be a minor cult hit among sitcom–weary viewers out there, watching "Christy" turned out for me to be a fairly tedious experience.

Really, this show is too sweet for its own good —— every character speaks so earnestly, with such gentle reflection in their voices, that it was nearly enough to drive this cynical viewer insane. Wanting to see intelligent programming I can understand, but without a more diverse cluster of characters to provide some dramatic tension, I suspect that the campaign to keep the series alive will meet with inevitable (and, in my mind, deserved) defeat.

Spring festival offers up alternate entertainment

By Mike MacLean
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts International Festival of the Arts (MIFA) will set its second annual festival into motion, featuring a wide range of venues hosting an even wider variety of events.

MIFA's aim is to make more people think of the Valley when they are trying to decide what to do on spring weekends. The festival places emphasis on vocal music events and theater, including children's opera and musical theater presentations.

The first weekend will establish a tradition which MIFA hopes to keep going for a long time — honoring a local historical landmark with a festival event. This year, Belchertown's congregational church, built in 1737, will be the location of the first such event, a concert on the common on Friday, April 21.

The last day of the opening weekend a benefit concert for the Community Music School of Springfield will be held at the Academy of Music. Pianist William Bolcom and vocalist Joan Morris will perform from their repertoire of popular songs that have earned them a strong following along the Mohawk Trail in northern New England.

The second weekend, from April 28 through April 30, will begin with a concert of Latino music at the ballroom of Holyoke's City Hall on Friday as a prelude to the festival's main event, "Rossini Opera Gala."

"Rossini Opera Gala," being held at the Academy of Music on Saturday, is a celebration of the composer Gioacchino Rossini and aside from featuring highlights from his more widely known works, "Il Barbiere Di Siviglia" and "La Cenerentola," the Gala will also showcase some of his more obscure works.

The Gala will feature singers from the Rossino Opera Festival of Pesaro–Italy and winners of this year's Metropolitan Opera competition. The evening will conclude with a formal champagne supper and dance at the Northampton Center for the Arts.

Sunday afternoon, April 30, the festival returns to Holyoke with a concert by acclaimed tenor Robert White. White was one of the more popular performers at last year's festival and will perform a wide variety of tunes in the music room of the Wistariahurst Museum in Holyoke.

Sunday night of the second weekend will close out with an opera/film by contemporary composer Philip Glass entitled La Belle et la Be'te. Glass has taken the original film by Jean Cocteau and re–written the musical score, which will be inserted while a silent version of the film is shown. The performance will take place at John M. Greene Hall on the Smith College campus.

The month of May kicks off with the third weekend of the MIFA festival featuring two presentations of the musical– comedy Flaming Saddles, created by Northampton residents Robert Cilman and Sally Rubenstone. The musical will be presented May 5 and 6 at the Academy of Music.

Also on Saturday will be an opera workshop entitled Patience and Sarah, based on the novel by Isabel Miller. MIFA hopes this workshop will be the first in an annual tradition.

Need something to keep the kids busy? On Sunday, May 7 at the First Church in Springfield's Court Square the highly successful children's musical Green Eggs and Ham, will return to the Valley after a well–received show at last year's festival. The musical will also be featured in Boston this spring.

The final weekend of the festival will see the arrival of a theater troupe from Ireland. The Gate Theater from Dublin will present a retrospect of the life of Samuel Beckett entitled I'll Go On, which will be performed on Friday, May 12, Saturday, May 13 and on Sunday afternoon, May 14.

The MIFA festival will take place from Friday, April 21 through Sunday, May 14. Tickets range in price from $15 to $75 with student and senior discount packages available. For more information contact MIFA at 1–800–224–MIFA.

White Zombie released their latest album Astro–Creep 2000

White Zombie rekindle rock traditions

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

ASTRO–CREEP 2000
White Zombie
Geffen Records

It was once said that all you need for a great rock n' roll song is three chords and enough attitude to leave any sane parent blocking their ears and running for safety.

With Astro–Creep 2000, White Zombie proves to be one of today's chief subscribers to this age old theory.

Just as bands like AC/DC did in the '70s with Highway To Hell and Motley Crüe did in the '80s with Shout At The Devil, White Zombie is singlehandedly trying to court white suburbia with their '90s version of familiar guitar crunch and harmless satanic fodder.

Don't let the band's ugly mugs that grace the cover fool you.

These guys are about as threatening as New Kids On The Block.

However, they will still leave oversensitive parents crying "backwards messages!"

With Astro Creep 2000, White Zombie wants you to fasten in and go along for their ride — a hellish one filled with dust covered roads and stinking of gasoline fumes.

They desperately want you to buy into their too–evil–for–words–shtick, but the fact of the matter is — it just isn't working.

Falling somewhere in the vast void between the industrial mayhem of Ministry and the "boy I'm bad" posterings of Danzig, White Zombie seem like prime candidates to be named the kings of pimple–faced, adolescent loners everywhere – five seconds into Astro Creep 2000 and you know the band wouldn't want it any other way.

Strung together with samples from B–horror movies (I think it's supposed to create some sort of mood, but I'm not quite sure), Astro Creep 2000 pretty much follows the standard metal–by–numbers formula.

With extra–crunchy riffage, heaps of double–bass drum etc., the formula is the same, but never trys to be inventive enough to lift itself out of self–parody.

At three it is truly hard to believe that these guys actually take themselves seriously.

Tossing off references to hell, death and destruction as though it were dinner conversation for most, singer Rob Zombie growls his way through the album in his distinct two styles — kind of distorted and mean, and really distorted and really mean.

With song titles such as "El Phantasmo And The Chicken–Run Blast–O–Rama" and "Grease Paint And Monkey Brains," it's pretty obvious what Astro Creep 2000 delivers.But although the album really lives up to the term "what you see, is what you get" there is no denying its importance in the grand scheme of rock music.

The album lacks any real musical merit –after a few songs it just sort of becomes a steady hum of unforgettable noise. It does fill a void that must be satisfied in order for rock music to keep its rebellious, good–for–nothing label intact.

In order to appreciate White Zombie in the least, there must be an ability on the part of the listener to separate the music from anything remotely serious.

Like bands who stake claim in this territory before, such as Kiss, half the fun is buying in the theatrics — the music takes second place.

But hey, that's what rock n' roll is all about, and as long as their are kids hanging out in parking lots and kicking back a few beers before a fun–filled night of mailbox smashing — White Zombie will live on and Astro Creep 2000 makes the perfect soundtrack. B–

Show brings fans closer to Cline

By Tara MK Connelly
Collegian Staff

Patsy Cline, Elvis, Mozart and John Lennon all have many things in common: they are all famous, they still have many fans today, but unfortunately they are also all deceased.

Many fans are often left wondering what it would be like to see such favored performers "live" on stage, but sometimes it is possible to turn back the hands of time. A Closer Walk With Patsy Cline is a chance to bring Patsy Cline fans a bit closer to the real thing.

On April 21 at Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. the woman who influenced modern day country singers such as Clint Black and Reba MacEntire will charm audiences (via impersonator Lisa Layne) once again. Patsy Cline became the first and youngest woman elected to the Country Music Hall of Fame as a solo act. Loretta Lynn, Dottie West and many other singers have contributed their great love form the music genre to Cline.

A Closer Walk begins with a fictional DJ "walking" the audience through Cline's life. From Cline's hometown of Winchester, Virginia, small roadhouse gigs, the famous Grand Ole Opery, shiny Las Vegas and on to Carnegie Hall the DJ transforms with the times from a hillbilly to classy comic.

The first act opens with "Come On In" and includes Cline favorites like "Crazy Arms," "Walkin' After Midnight" and the popular "Your Cheatin' Heart." The second act has "She's Got You," "Sweet Dreams," and of course, "Crazy."

Layne plays Cline with astounding clarity that even brings a tear to Cline's husband, Charlie Dick. Layne walks "Patsy" through the years with talent from cowgirl to slinky Vegas singer. She is backed by a talented five piece band that have recreated the perfect sounds of yesteryears with Layne singing sweetly along.

The singer started her career at age four with her father's group in Texas. After graduating high school she joined a girl band called The Creek where she learned to play bass. After attending college she joined up with Vince Vance and the Valiants. The ensemble toured the country for five years. During that time they recorded "All I Want For Christmas is You" which is now the number one requested holiday single in the United States and was re–recorded by pop songstress Mariah Carey for her Christmas album.

Cline was killed in a plane crash in the Tennessee mountain north of Nashville 32 years ago. She was inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame at age 41. Hawkshaw Hawkins and Cowboy Copas plus her manager Randy Hughes also died with Cline — the singer was at the height of her career.

COURTESY FINE ARTS CENTER

Patsy Cline will be remembered in A Closer Walk with Patsy Cline this Friday night.

"During her life time Patsy Cline broke the boundaries of country music to dabble in blues, rock jazz and pop," said Adrian Chaberlin in her review of A Closer Walk for the Times–Colonist.

A Closer Walk was created by Canadian writer and director Dean Regan in 1991. The first tour played 45 cities all with extended dates. In the United States the show played St. Louis and Boston to shining reviews.

Also available with the show is a Southwestern Dinner package for two at the University of Massachusetts' Faculty Club plus free shuttle transportation to and from the show.

A Closer walk with Patsy Cline will be featured at Bowker Auditorium. The performance begins at 8 p.m. Tickets are $23 and $20. For more tickets and more information call the Fine Arts Center Box office at 545–2511. For information or reservations for the dinner call 545–3671.

Indian music to enchant UMass

Sitar, tabla virtuosos to play classical Indian compositions

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

Eight generations ago, the family of Nishat Khan performed at the court of the great Mogul Emperor Akabar in the 16th century.

Today, a member of India's first family of Indian classical music, international virtuoso Nishat Khan will perform the sitar in a concert at Bowker Auditorium on April 22 at 8 pm. He will be joined by another master, Zakir Hussain who plays the tabla. The evenings program will include Evening Raag and Night Raag.

Khan who has been performing since the age of seven was taught by his father, Ustad Imrat Khan. The Khan family is responsible for the evolution of the sitar in its present form.

He said, "Indian music became very popular during the '60s and people like Ravi Shankar and my father popularized it a lot."

But unlike Shankar who experimented with western musicians, Khan said, "I want to take this music to new people and introduce them to the real thing: the real classical side of the music."

He has also developed his own unique style which blends the haunting tones of the sitar and the exotic vocal music of India. He achieves this by allowing the strings to sustain through amplification which creates a greater fluidity.

Khan explains, "Music is the language of the heart and soul that crosses all boundaries. Where words fail music communicates."

He has recorded music for films such as 1983's Heat and Dust as well as composing music for various international feature films and documentaries. In addition, Khan has performed with a diverse range of musicians from Ray Charles and jazz guitarist John McLaughlin to the Victoria Symphony and Luciano Pavarotti. He has since been performing extensively in all the major music festivals in India and abroad to considerable critical acclaim.

Tickets for the performance are $20 and $12 with half– price tickets for Five College students. Tickets for children 16 and under are $10. For more information, call the Fine Arts Center Box Office at 545–2511.

PRISM to showcase variety of music, talent

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

A traditional concert format may consist of one audience, one stage and music. However, the PRISM III concert on April 22 at the Fine Arts Center at 8 p.m., will be anything but traditional.

In an attempt to redefine what a concert is, University of Massachusetts' Professor Malcolm W. Rowell will present poetry and sculpture in the third concert of the PRISM series.

"I believe that it is most important for us to enlarge our conception of a 'concert'," Rowell said

"In creating PRISM III, we have worked to present a diversity of musical ensembles and styles and to include other art forms."

There is no single stage for the PRISM III concert.

Instead musicians may be playing the sides of the stage, the back of the auditorium, the balconies and, just to pacify the traditionalists, the main stage as well.

Award winning poet and UMass professor and author, James Tate will read two new poems at the concert.

Anyone who has heard or read Tate's humorous and sometimes tangy poetry will definitely not want to miss his most recent creations.

After the performers please the ears and the hearts of the audience with their music and poetry, sculptures from the UMass Art Department will be on hand to appease the eyes.

Sculptures will be displayed throughout the concert hall, on stage and in the lobby.

All ensembles will be performing in such rapid succession that audiences will be forced to simply sit back and enjoy the ride.

The music program will include performances by the Opera Workshop, Percussion Ensemble, Wind Ensemble, Youth Wind Ensemble.

It will also include performances by the A Cafellas, Jazz Combo, String Quartet and Woodwind Trio.

Tickets are $8 general public; $4 students, senior citizens and children; UMass free with valid ID.

Tickets are available at the FAC Box Office or at the door on the evening of the event.

TMBG mixes live show with quirky songs

By Matt Audette
Collegian Staff

They're back ... yes, once again the wacky lads in They Might Be Giants will descend upon the Valley in all their quirky glory when they take the stage at Pearl Street on April 25.

Having risen from cult heroes to mainstream favorites, TMBG has been wowing the area with their anything-goes live performances since they first packed up their drum machine and hit the road (the group has since played more than 1,000 shows). But, alas, times have changed and so has the band. Ditching the duo status, TMBG founders John Linnell and John Flansburough, have incorporated a live, working band into their shows as well as onto their last album John Henry.

Beginning their career in Brooklyn by constructing witty, pop gems in disguise as Sesame Street sing-alongs, the two John's went on to release their self-titled debut to much acclaim.

Garnering much critical acclaim the band went on to release their follow-up effort Lincoln, but it was their major label debut Flood (which recently went gold), which caught the public's ear thanks to the single "Birdhouse In Your Soul." After receiving airplay on both the radio and MTV, TMBG's career began to snowball and soon the duo found themselves emerging from the underground and into the spotlight.

Of course, with this newfound popularity TMBG eventually found their line-up status to be creatively restricting. Putting out one more album as a duo (Apollo 18) the group began incorporating a full band into their live shows.

This new direction worked so well that the Johns decided to push away the drum machine and settle for a six-piece band instead. The difference can be heard on John Henry, as the band's sound has become more fleshed out thanks to the talents of drummer Brian Doherty, who has worked with the likes of Freedy Johnston and XTC, trumpeter Seven Bernstein, musical director of the Lounge Lizards, multi-instrumentalist Kurt Hoffman, formally of the Ordinares and bassist Tony Maimone, who has worked with Pere Ubu and Bob Mould.

Since the group often partakes in a relentless touring schedule, their skills as a full-fledged band have become second to none. This wider range of talent allows for greater improvisation, especially during performances of the band's older material. Plus, they never fail to have a few surprises up their sleeves.

They Might Be Giants will perform on April 25, Pearl Street. Call 584-7771 for more info.

against a horde of marauding bandits. Kurosawa is able to portray the exhilaration of battle and also offer a poignant social commentary on its price.

The great Toshiro Mifune and Takashi Shimura (both part of Kurosawa's repertoire) are a wonder to watch in their most unforgettable roles. From script, to camera work, to acting, to editing are all absolutely perfect. It's little wonder Kurosawa was a huge influence on George Lucas (see Star Wars) — he is a true master. (M.B.)

5. JULES AND JIM

The center of cinema's most celebrated love triangle is the luminous Catherine (played with reckless beauty by Jeanne Moreau), an impulsive free spirit who leads the title characters into an ebullient romance and to inevitable tragedy. This the François Truffaut most people like to remember, a humble artist concerned with if and how the romantic ideals we construct for ourselves can exist in the frustratingly real "real world."

You'll want to see it for the impeccable performances and for the impressive Jazz Age period details, but most of all for Truffaut's evocative and humanistic romanticism and what Penelope Houston wrote as "the sense of a director intoxicated with the pleasure of making films." (J.L.)

6. CRIES AND WHISPERS

Ingmar Bergman's Cries and Whispers is one of those films that after watching you never forget. Like his earlier film The Seventh Seal, Bergman brutally confronts death (this time without the actual manifestation) through a woman in the final stages of cancer. Whereas in The Seventh Seal, the knight could find no answers to his questioning of the existence of God, a matured Bergman is able to see some form of hope through relationships with other people.

These relationships take form between the dying woman, her sisters, and a maid. They try to connect, and while some bonds ultimately fail, one isn't broken even in death. Cries and Whispers is at times unrelenting and horrific; Bergman never wavers for an instant in showing the woman's grotesque death, and yet, in the end this may be his most positive and profound film. (M.B.)

NAPOLEON

In 1981, filmmaker Abel Gance finally received the recognition he sought all his life when his recently restored 1927 awe-inspiring epic Napoleon made its triumphant debut at New York's Radio City Music Hall, winning cheers and standing ovations throughout the screening. This reaction echoed the equally jubilant reception the film secured in London two years earlier. Gance died 19 days after the New York premiere, just two weeks following his 92nd birthday.

His legacy was sealed with Napoleon, a marvel of early film technique and cinematic storytelling so vast it stands as a virtual dictionary of the syntax of the silent film era. Utilizing inventive camera movements that still manage to amaze, and incorporating sequences filmed with three synchronized cameras (predating the Cinerama technique by some 30 years), Gance concocted a film that matched the scope and complexity of its subject.

Though Gance created other memorable films the reenlisted in the French army just to film battle sequences for 1919's anti-war tale J'accuse), Napoleon proved a life- long obsession for the filmmaker. He updated it in 1934 by adding stereophonic sound effects, and the 1979 restoration featured scenes Gance shot in 3-D and color in 1927. A masterpiece that earns the title. (J.L.)

The Third Man: Its deliciously cynical attitude is embodied in Orson Welles' grin, finding a near-perfect film realization of Graham Greene's equally sublime screenplay.

Cries and Whispers is at times unrelenting and horrific; Bergman never wavers for an instant in showing the woman's grotesque death, and yet, in the end this may be his most positive and profound film.

7. TOKYO STORY

Yasujiro Ozu is supposed to be the most homegrown of all of Japan's directors. Yet, then why are his films so powerful and so moving across the world 40 years later? Perhaps one could find many answers to such a question, but the one that seems most easily apparent is that Ozu fundamentally understands how to tell a story in his own distinct style.

The story is about an elderly couple who travel to Tokyo to see their grown-up children. Instead of being enthusiastically received, they are brushed off due to selfishness and time and money constraints. Never schmaltzy, Ozu patiently weaves this tale in such a way that the audience is hypnotically drawn in. This in part due to almost no camera movement in Tokyo Story, as is the case in most of his films. Indeed, what we see is a master director using his own cinematic language to create shot for shot a film that is both tragic and breathtaking. (M.B.)

8. PERSONA

Although this is undoubtedly one of the greatest films of all time, it is a difficult movie to recommend to people who are not familiar with Bergman's work. Persona is a culmination, of sorts, of his three previous efforts — Through a Glass Darkly, Winter Light and The Silence (all of which are great in their own right).

After a brief but important prologue, the story begins with an actress (Liv Ullman) who decides to stop talking. Horrified with the suffering of the world, she retreats to an island with a nurse (played by Bibi Anderson). The two begin a fascinating relationship in which they discover who they are by their relation to each other. In one famous scene, Bergman and the great cinematographer Sven Nykvist merge the two women's faces together as their personalities strangely transfer. A difficult and often times confusing film, reading some criticism may be fruitful in understanding its greatness. (M.B)

Jules et Jim: You'll want to see it for the impeccable performances and for the impressive Jazz Age period details, but most of all for Truffaut's evocative and humanistic romanticism.

9. THE THIRD MAN

What most people remember about Carol Reed's oft- echoed thriller is Orson Welles' celebrated entrance midway through. As Harry Lime, the presumed-dead black marketeer who's managed to take advantage of just about everyone in post-World War II Vienna, Welles' inimitable mug is suddenly illuminated in a cavernous doorway ... but is it a sinister smile or a jokey smirk?

The Third Man's deliciously cynical attitude is embodied in that grin, finding a near-perfect film realization of Graham Greene's equally sublime screenplay. Though Welles makes the biggest impact, fellow Kane alumnus Joseph Cotton is the lead, an American dime writer whose search for Lime leads to some malevolent doings with the war-torn Vienna underground. Photographed in high style by Robert Krasker, it features a zither score that's guaranteed to linger in your head. (J.L.)

WILD STRAWBERRIES

Ingmar Bergman's heartfelt story of an aged doctor's journey through a landscape of dream and memory is still penetrating today. As he travels to receive an honorary degree, the doctor experiences haunting flashbacks which force him to confront his life and its disappointments.

Bergman adeptly intertwines past and present, dream and reality, creating a surreal masterpiece that is never self- indulgent. Credit is also due to Victor Sjostrom's outstanding performance as the doctor. Sjostrom's sad eyes and weary face express more in a look than many films do in their entirety. The beautiful Ingrid Thulin is also able to hold her own as his daughter-in-law. Wild Strawberries is a film to come back to time and time again as one gets older. (M.B.)

10. THE EARRINGS OF MADAME DE...

Max Ophüls' dizzyingly fluid camera movements were a natural extension of the directors impassioned love for film form. This is no better seen here, a melodrama involving a society woman (Danielle Darrieux) who sells the earrings given to her by her husband (Charles Boyer) only to have them come back to haunt her by way of an Italian diplomat (Vittorio de Sica).

Plot was never the true point for Ophüls though, who used some downright dazzling camera pans, tilts, cranes, etc., coupled with an ingenious exploitation of mise-en-scène to more fully explore his characters and their shadowy motives. A virtuoso with style to spare, Ophüls directed a few American films (1948's Letter to an Unknown Woman is the best of them), but Earrings remains his most paramount effort, capturing Ophüls' sensuous technique in a timeless swoon. (J.L.)

UMass Concert Band joins forces with choir

By Matthew Justin Faerber
Collegian Staff

For Professor Walter Chesnut, this Sunday's performance by the University Brass Choir will not be just any concert, it will mark his return to directing the choir after a 10-year absence. A decade ago, Chesnut suffered a severe spinal injury which left him in a wheelchair and sidelined him from his role as Brass Choir director.

This Sunday, April 23, Chesnut's choir will be making their first formal performance in more than 10 years as part of a dual concert with the Minuteman Concert Band. Chesnut is very enthusiastic about the Brass Choir's return.

"It's great to have the choir back," said Chesnut. "They've been very ambitious in their preparation, rehearsing at 8 a.m. every Friday morning."

The concert will feature the performance of four works by each ensemble, followed by the combined efforts of both groups to perform the final movement of Basil Kailinnikov's "Symphony No. 1 in G Minor" for the grand finale.

Beginning at 3 p.m., the Brass Choir will perform Vaclav Nelhybel's "Choral For Brass and Percussion," Percy Grainer's "Shepard's Hey," Maurice Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante Defunte," and Alfred Reed's "Symphony for Brass and Percussion."

Following their performance, the Minuteman Concert Band, directed by George N. Parks, will take the spotlight. Their repertoire consists of Henry Fillmore's "The Klaxon," Peter Mennin's "Cazona," Pierre La Plane's "Prospect" and Jim Curnow's "Canticle of the Creatures."

The Minuteman Concert Band and the University Brass Choir will perform at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall beginning at 3 p.m. Tickets are $4 students, elders and children; $8 general public. Tickets will be available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office and at the door on the day of the show.

The FYI section of the Collegian is open to the community to advertise events in the area. Our deadline is 3 p.m. daily and we do not accept FYIs over the phone. Please mail or hand deliver your submissions as early as possible.

All submissions must be type written with a contact name and phone number to clarify any questions.

Do you think there are efforts on campus to improve Black and Jewish relations on campus? What do you think could be done?

"Two communities who have historically been oppressed should not be oppressing each other. I think the answer is not a clear yes or no. There has been some small events to bring the communities together such as Maya Angelou and Eli Wiesel, and the multicultural Seder. I think what needs to be done is an informal setting of Black and Jewish leaders, without media, to begin a dialogue in hopes of building bridges between the two communities."

—JAMIE RESNICK
freshman, political science
Marblehead

"I think people blow things out of proportion on this campus. On an individual basis, Black and Jewish students students don't have anything to be at each others throats about. I think a few people portray the Black and Jewish students to be at each others throats. The Jewish students are not our enemies. For me it is not an issue."

—MOISE TIRADO
senior, political science
Afro Am, STPEC
Port Au Prince, Haiti

"I am in a social diversity class, and that is where I see the most conflict between Black and Jewish people. It doesn't seem like people of color understand the way Jewish people are oppressed because it is different. They don't seem to feel Jewish segregation is as bad as Black egregation because not everyone can see that they are Jewish. If groups got together and spoke then both parties could better understand what the other is feeling."

—HEATHER MCCARTHY
junior, nursing
Lancaster

"Personally I haven't seen any efforts lately, then again I don't know about in-depth relations. Maya Angelou and Elie Wiesel were a good start. I hope something good comes out of it."

—CASSANDRA CARTY
freshman, communications
Brooklyn, N.Y.

"I don't think it is prudent for the school to fund a speaker which is obviously going to instigate racial tension. Maybe speakers like Maya Angelou and Elie Wiesel were obviously a good start. When we invite intelligent, well respected minds to speak against the tension that a speaker like Farrakhan instigated it helps to alleviate the tension."

—JEFF COOPERMAN
senior, business, philosophy
Clarks Summit, Pa.

"I think there have been efforts, like speakers Maya Angelou and Elie Wiesel. I think there are a lot of misunderstandings and grudges being held. There are a lot of nice things being said on the surface about oppression. Recognizing common ties is good, but there needs to be a serious dialogue so people can really express feelings."

SGA passes action referenda to add more senate seats

By Marnie Thamel
Collegian Staff

A motion for an action referenda passed last night at the senate's weekly meeting.

The referenda implements a special election in the next two weeks to revamp voting procedure for Student Government Association (SGA) senators.

The senate also unanimously passed a motion to support the efforts of Commuter Services and the Housing Resources Center in their campaign to bring polling locations to campus.

The action referenda was instituted because the Student Judiciary found last week that there was no senate seat districting that gave every SGA member "equal voice and vote," according to Chair Larry Plano.

However, the senate has a limited amount of power, according to Plano.

"The students give the senate power. In the by laws there is a section which restricts the senate's power. It doesn't allow us to do some things with out 5 percent of the students vote," he said.

The Judiciary gave the senate a May 6 deadline to rewrite the chapter of the Constitution concerning electoral districts, which requires a 5 percent student vote, Plano said.

"It was a difficult deadline to meet, I don't think they planned on us meeting it," he said.

The ballot will consist of one question — yes or no for new electoral districts in the SGA constitution.

"It deals with how senators are determined, and how students vote for senators," Plano said.

If 5 percent of students vote, the senate will then vote, and the main change would be that senators would not represent constituents in dorms, but in electoral district areas.

The former policy said dorms were districts which did not allow "equal voice and vote" because

Most foreign students on F-1 visas are eligible for 12 months of work authorization - Practical Training - in their field of study following the completion of their degree (If you have received Practical Training permission in the past, you may be eligible for less than the allotted 12 months). If you will be completing your studies at the end of this semester and wish to apply for Practical Training, please come to our office as soon as possible, as it can take 5-6 weeks to receive approval from the Immigration Service. Please note that you may NOT start working until the Practical Training application has been approved. If you are a foreign student on a visa other than F-1, please come to our office to inquire about your possibilities for work authorization.

•VALIDITY OF VISA DOCUMENTS (I-20/IAP-66)
It is the foreign student's responsibility to insure that he/she continue to maintain legal non-immigrant status during his/her stay in the U.S. F-1 visa holders should check their I-20 form and be aware of the following: 1) Expiration date. This date is found in item #5 where it says "complete studies not later than (date)". If you do not plan on completing your studies before this date, you must come to our office to inquire as to how an extension can be requested. You should plan on coming to our office at least 2-3 months before the expiration date. 2) Degree and Major: These are found in items #4 and #5, respectively. If you have changed majors or degree programs, you must have your I-20 form updated to reflect these changes. J-1 visa holders should similarly ensure that their IAP-66 form remains accurate. The expiration date and major are listed in sections #3 and #4.

•ORIENTATION PROGRAM FOR FALL 1995
If you are a foreign student who is interested in working with the Orientation Program for new foreign students in September, please come to our office in 467 Hills South to pick up an application. The applications will be available on April 21st and will be due on April 28. Interviews will be scheduled for early May. The Orientation Program will be held during the week of August 28th. Students working for the Orientation Program must be available beginning on August 26th.

'Humongous' Haigis Hoopla hits happy valley

By Christopher Hassett
Collegian Staff

Get ready University of Massachusetts, Haigis Hoopla is upon us again.

Starting this Friday at 5 p.m., the events begin with the registration party for the nearly 1,400 participants, growing to an expected arrival of 6,000 to 7,000 spectators and finishing with the winning teams receiving their awards Sunday evening.

ESPN's Karl Ravech will be in attendance all day Saturday, announcing and appearing at the various sub-events. Ravech was promoted to the position of broadcaster on "Baseball Tonight" for the summer.

With 382 teams, 21 courts and bleachers and a Sports Court being used for the first time, this is the biggest Hoopla in history, said Professor Mark McDonald, executive director of Haigis Hoopla. By comparison, the first Hoopla five years ago had 109 teams.

"Size-wise, it's humongous," McDonald said. "We're going to keep growing with other departments on campus to make a bigger and better event."

The Hoopla will consist of a free-throw competition, a slam dunk contest, a long distance shoot-out, foul shot competition and the Hoopla games themselves. Prizes include airline tickets, sneakers, gift certificates and car stereos, McDonald said.

Another contest at the event sponsored by the Lorenz auto dealership will be a shoot-out for a GMC truck to the winning participant.

In an effort to include more women in the competition, Spalding sports will be sponsoring a women's clinic on Saturday at 1 p.m. to help women practice their basketball.

"It's not a matter of special help," McDonald said. "It's a further benefit to get women involved. The clinic is to show that we care about women's basketball."

The Weldon Wheelers will also be putting on an exhibition. They are a basketball team made up of people in wheelchairs.

All participants must attend the Friday night registration party in order to sign a participation waiver. The waiver responsibility to the University in case of injury. Participants will also receive a Hoopla t-shirt and gift bag at the party.

The event is a class project for the "Sports Event Management Class" in the sports management department. The class hopes this year's Hoopla will be the best one yet.

In case of rain, the Hoopla will be moved to the week-end of May 1st and 2nd. If rain continues the Hoopla will be played indoors. All decisions will be made by 7 a.m. each day of competition.

So UMass prepares for another weekend of sports, fun and excitement in what is planned to be the grandest Hoopla yet.

Earth Day to celebrate its silver anniversary

By Robert Dunn
Collegian Correspondent

Earth Day turns 25 years old this Saturday, and MASSPIRG is planning a day-long celebration to mark the event.

From 10 a.m. until 8 p.m. the Student Union lawn will be the site for local bands, speakers, info tables and other events dealing with environmental issues to help ring in Earth Day's silver anniversary.

This year MASSPIRG is running Earth Day in cooperation with the Free the Planet Coalition, who will not only provide a theme for this year's event, but also provide funds, according to Jen Meuller, a MASSPIRG intern.

"It's a wonderful campaign, as campaigns go," she said.

The Free the Planet Coalition is a group made up of individual public interest research groups (PIRGs) and environmental groups throughout the country.

The first Earth Day was held in 1970, and was organized by former senator Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) as a response to what he considered a lack of political attention being given to environmental issues.

According to an article written by Nelson, results of the first Earth Day were the adoption of the clean water and air acts, as well as several other environmental laws.

At last count the coalition was running Earth Day events on 100 campuses in 44 states, Meuller said.

This year's theme is "Free the Planet," and the main goal of the campaign is to persuade Congress to be more environmentally conscious through a petition drive. The petition contains a 25-item list of laws and policies that, according to MASSPIRG, would benefit the environment substantially.

One problem Earth Day faces this year is sponsorship by corporations whom MASSPIRG and the Free the Planet coalition feel are inappropriate, Meuller said.

"We don't have a problem with environmental groups sponsoring us, but with companies like Texaco, who are trying to present themselves not as polluters, which they are," she said.

Mueller also said in some cities students were running counter-demonstrations as a protest to the sponsorship.

MASSPIRG plans to start the celebration early by sponsoring a benefit concert featuring Synaesthesia, Peace Tribe and Chameleon's Colors, to be held in the Hatch on Friday night. Proceeds will benefit the Siskiyou Action Project, a group dedicated to preserving the ancient forests of the Pacific Northwest, according to Shannon Raborn, a MASSPIRG organizer.

Admission to Friday's concert will be $4 at the door, Earth Day events on Saturday are free and open to the public.

Speaker blames capitalists for Third World poverty

By Michael C.L. Elliott
Collegian Correspondent

The misconceptions surrounding the "population crisis" have lead to ineffective, and in some cases, destructive policies which fail to address the real issue at hand, said Paul Shore, a representative of the Maoist Internationalist Movement.

Shore lectured on "Population: Too Many Poor People or Too Many Capitalists," in the Campus Center, Tuesday night.

"We are not asking the right questions," Shore said, commenting on mainstream attempts to tackle population, such as last years United Nations population control conference in Cairo.

"Nobody talks about resource use ... how people are interacting with the environment is really the crux of the matter," Shore said.

The relationship between the international economy, production and population are "inevitably linked," said Shore.

"Production in the world is defined by trans-national capitalism from the first to the Third World," he said.

Shore criticized the United Nations and other non-governmental organizations (NGO's), such as the Sierra Club, for failing to acknowledge the problem of over-population extends beyond the boarders of the Third World.

Current remedies advocated by the United Nations and NGOs include sterilization, a practice which is tainted "through the lens of imperialism."

At present, nearly 20 percent of women living in the Third World have been treated with such sterilization programs, according to Shore.

Concerns that Third World countries will become incapable of feeding their continually growing populations are invalid, said Shore, because reasons behind these shortages have been created by first world manipulation of third world agricultural resources.

Shore spoke of Brazil, which came under the pressure of wealthier countries to invest in the development of soy crops for export.

Brazil is now the fourth largest producer of soy in the world, but it came at the expense of those who lived in areas the government designated for the conversion to farm land, Shore said.

In addition to their displacement, Shore explained because of the soy crops, native Brazilians now have less land available to produce crops for domestic consumption, and less able to support a growing population.

The consequences of export driven agricultural policies can be catastrophic, said Shore. In Senegal, from 1974-1975, more than 100,000 people starved because half of the available land was controlled by European peanut and pineapple interests intended for export.

Similar dilemmas exist in the Dominican Republic were roughly half of their farm land is used for sugar production for the United States, Shore said.

Third World countries desire growing export crops as they seek to accumulate the needed foreign exchange to re-pay debts incurred from first world countries to finance their export crop development programs, Shore said.

With such pressure placed on these types of crops, coupled with the importation of relatively inexpensive U.S. grain, which bankrupt local producers and leaves countries dependent on America for this essential food staple, Shore said.

According to Shore, many people living in the third world find themselves "just meals away from starvation."

some residence halls could not fill senate seats and other students could not fill the empty seats because they didn't live in the residence hall.

"The two things that will be beneficial are one, more of the senate seats will be occupied, whereas right now roughly half are full, and a lot more people will have a chance to be involved in student government," Plano said.

The senate last night also backed former speaker and (Graduate Employment Organization) GEO member Matt Pavesi in his fight to bring voting polls to campus.

Pavesi spoke about the Town of Amherst giving nothing to the students while the students bring business and revenue to the town.

"Not many students have the time to get to the polling places," Pavesi said, "What's a better place to vote than on campus?"

Affirmative action targeted by panel

By Chris Conner
Collegian Staff

The timely topic of affirmative action was the focus of a heated panel discussion last Thursday.

Comprised of students and faculty, the panel offered diverse perspectives on this controversial issue. Approximately 50 people attended.

John Bracey, professor of Afro-American studies, caused the first ripples of the evening when he objected to the reading of absent panelist sociology Professor Paul Hollander's anti-affirmative statement.

Hollander's anti-affirmative action piece, which ran eight pages long, took 15 minutes to read — 10 minutes past the allotted time for each panelist.

"If I hadn't shown up and given you a 25-page statement, would you have read it?" Bracey asked Julianna Miller, one of the organizers of the event and the reader of the statement. "That's racial preference in action."

Following Miller's reading, Bracey then demanded, and subsequently received, the same time allotment as Hollander.

Bracey attacked what he called "the mythology that White people believe in a color blind society.

"The only people who believe in a color blind society are people who have never worked for one," Bracey said.

Taking the opposing view on affirmative action, Students For Life president Veronica Breckheimer followed Bracey, pointing out the neglect of women in his argument.

"I'm totally appalled that I might someday be hired just because I'm a woman," Breckheimer said.

Later, during the question and answer session, a student asked Breckheimer about her feelings on the inequity of wages between the sexes, which is approximately 70 cents for women to the male dollar.

"Maybe it's incentive for mothers not to go to work and stay home," Breckheimer said. "Which is where they should be."

Both Republican Club president Paul Ferro and Conservative Alliance president Jason Hycjek echoed the sentiments of Breckheimer in her anti-affirmative action stance.

Ferro commented on the further push toward inequality that he believes the policy embraces.

"Stop trying to make the playing field level by tipping it in favor of one side," Ferro said.

The conservative arguments presented by the trio of student leaders were countered by those of Black Student Union president Shomwa Shamapande and Admissions Director Arlene Cash.

Shamapande said with the national percentages of Blacks in professional positions at such a low, affirmative action is still necessary, despite some belief that the policy has become outdated.

"Just because we have a law that says we should drive 55 miles per hour doesn't mean that everybody is driving 55," he said. "It doesn't mean we don't need highway police."

Cash, who said she appreciated the benefits of affirmative action she received, also refuted the allegation that she admits unqualified Black students.

"There is no quota at UMass," she said.

defeating her opponent handily in straight sets 6-1, 6-4.

In quarterfinal doubles action, the duo of Sitton and Steele crushed their opponent 6-2, 6-0, Durant and Orsini united to win the second doubles 7-5, 6-0, and to complete the doubles tri-fecta, Gorodetskaya and freshman Amy Sidran handed their competition a 6-3, 6-1 defeat.

After a first round blow-out, all cylinders appeared to be clicking for the Minutewomen, but rockier roads were ahead. In the semi-finals the team had to face the first seeded school rival, the Temple Owls.

Temple, the eventual winner of the tournament, proved too strong and experienced for the young Minutewomen as they fell to the Owls by a score of 7-2.

The two bright spots for the Minutewomen in this semi- final defeat were sparked by none other than captain Sitton. Sitton defeated Temple No. 1, Cila Medieros, in three sets with a 6-7, 6-3, 6-2 triumph. After two weeks of displaying strong confident play, it appears her problems earlier in the season with confidence and mental play are water under the bridge.

"Liesl Sitton has stepped up," Dixon said. "She had been struggling and her goal was to step up to the next level. This was the best win of her career."

UMass' other victory in the semi-final match-up came when Sitton and tag team partner Steele shined in winning a nail-biter, the result was a 6-4, 2-6, 7-6 win.

The remainder of the singles matches belonged to the Owls as they handled the Minutewomen, but not without a fight. Every match was competitive and placing fourth was a big step for the Minutewomen.

"A year ago, my goal was to end up fifth in the A-10," said Dixon about her rebuilding the program with young talent. "They ended up fourth, which means they were in competition with the top four teams and the way they did it was a huge step."

The season is now complete for the Minutewomen and is reflected upon as a rebuilding year. The team consisted of nine players, six of which were underclassmen, including five freshman. With not enough leadership to go around, immaturity was a major issue Dixon had to face all season. Dixon benched two of her starters before the match against the University of Rhode Island and made the squad spend two hours with a sports psychologist in an attempt spark her players before the tournament.

"All along I have been talking about this team as being a team of the future," Dixon said. "This team will be doing really well in two years when they get to be a bit older, and this year they had to take some licks and gain maturity."

The team looks forward to a couple of new recruits that will contend for top six spots next season and bids adieu to exchange student Catalina Mejia and senior Mary Edwards. Edwards was the lone senior on the dominantly freshman squad and her humor and athleticism will be missed.

■ Minutemen

Murphy walked and scored on first baseman Justin Kelly's triple. Kelly went 2-for-3 with an RBI.

Third baseman Brad Gorrie followed with a sacrifice fly to rightfield, driving home Kelly for a 3-0 edge through two innings.

The Rams jumped on Softic in the fourth to get on the scoreboard. Olney sent a flyball to shallow center that dropped in front of a diving Nate Murphy and leftfielder Ryan Jette for a base hit, scoring Rhode Island's only two runs against Softic before the sixth.

Because of inclement weather throughout most of New England, Rhode Island did not arrive at Earl Lorden Field until 5 p.m., two hours after the scheduled start of yesterday's game. However, the Minutemen didn't seem to mind the wait.

Shortstop Mark Pileski said that last week, after a doubleheader against Duquesne was rained out on Friday, the team went back to the hotel and was tight for the rest of the weekend. The Minutemen lost two of three games against the Dukes. This time, though, the players were not about to become tense, according to Pileski.

After warming up around 4 p.m., pitcher Chad Peronto, with Nate Murphy as a batter, started to mimic the actions of a catcher, as if he was snaring down a pop-up or fielding a bunt. Soon after, one-by-one, Massachusetts players began to join in and take part in the "exhibition" game.

The line-up: Murphy became the umpire; Pileski took his place as batter; public address announcer Mike Reiss was the first baseman; pitcher Jay Murphy was at second base; catcher Andy Pelis acted as the shortstop; pitcher Jason Bennett was the third baseman; back-up catcher Jason Kudrikow was the pitcher; second baseman Muchie Dagliere was the runner.

The sparse crowd that had showed up at Lorden Field for the game at its regular starting time stuck around to watch the Minutemen and their make-believe game, long enough to catch the regularly scheduled one, too.

Pileski said the "pick-up" game was spontaneous, but it was a good way to have fun and stay loose.

"Earlier in the day, it didn't even look like we were going to have a game. Fooling around before the game was a good thing. It kept our minds on the game," Pileski said. "Basically, it was just goofin' around."

The Minutemen return to action today (3 p.m.) as they host Hartford. Scott Barnsby will get the start for Massachusetts against the Hawks.

to scare any competitor, never mind a freshman.

But Schwartz realizes he just needs to attend to the business at hand and do the best he possibly can. When asked to look ahead to the meet, his commentary was one of a realist.

"I'm nervous, but excited at the same time," Schwartz said. "I have got a lot to prove out there, but then again I also have three more years as well."

Competitions such as the one Schwartz is taking place in, are familiar situations for him, even though he is a freshman. The past three years while attending Division Avenue High School in Levitton, N.Y. on Long Island, Schwartz was crowned Junior Boys National Champion on the rings. He said he feels this will help him with his preparation to compete with the country's elite gymnasts, in what will be his biggest performance to date.

Keeping focused is something that has been taught to all gymnasts, but consistency in that talent is rarely found. Earlier this season, as UMass was on their way to their seventh straight New England Championship, Kevin was competing for the first time in a meet of such stature. It was in that meet that Schwartz received his first perfect 10 as a collegiate athlete. He attributed it largely to his concentration and preparation for big events.

"I always think back to my old coach Kerin Krowl," Schwartz said. "He used to preach to me, 'when you are in a meet, you concentrate on your routine and nothing else.'"

That is a sentiment which is also reflected in the coaching tactics of Johnson.

"I think he is an experienced performer and the key to performance is concentration and just blocking out everything that surrounds you. That is something that he does very well."

Along with his coaches over the years, Schwartz attributes a great deal of his success to his teammates and the closeness of the unit here at UMass.

"I choose to come to UMass because of the team. It is so close, almost like a family," Schwartz said. "I really like that a lot."

The emotion and closeness of the team was exhibited in the final event of the ECAC championships, which UMass captured as a team. The entire group came together as one when each competitor's score was flashed. The exuberance carried the performers to a record score in the event, the high bar, and put UMass over the top to win the meet.

"I'm close to everyone on the team, everyone pushes and encourages each other," Schwartz said. "There are a couple of people who have really helped me. Gabe Columbus and Kiai Oboler for example. They really pushed me when I was in the gym, when I had to work harder. Especially my assistant coach Steve Christensen, he really helped me out the most."

As a result of his hard work in the gym and the support of his teammates, Schwartz, who will turn 19 tomorrow, is in position to give himself the ultimate birthday present. A national championship.

■ Tolhurst

score of 38.325 in the Regionals, she was able to move on. But at the Nationals, falls on the uneven bars (8.90) and balance beam (8.625) put a damper on any celebration for her accomplishments that year.

But this year, after a consistent season and a No. 5 regional ranking in the all-around, she took the Northeast Regional title for herself (38.350). In the process, Tolhurst outdistanced the No. 1 regionally ranked gymnast, and UNH standout, Jana Reardon by two-one hundredths of a point. In comparing last year's Regionals with this year's, the scores on her respective events, except for the vault, show a direct relation with each other.

With her scores in the uneven bars ('94- 9.40 to '95- 9.525), floor exercise (9.45 to 9.55) and the balance beam (9.70 in both years), her consistency has not been lost with the switch from GWU to UMass. But the difference this year is something that can not be seen on a stat sheet, and that is experience.

"This year, I definitely know what to expect, both noise- wise and crowd-wise," Tolhurst said. "I am much more prepared because Dave has had me working hard, and also has been telling me that making it to the Nationals is a great thing."

"Last year was a learning experience for J, and you learn from those situations," Kuzara said. "I think she will be a lot better off for it this year. J is a real honest gymnast, where she does everything to get fully prepared, instead of cutting corners."

The last two weeks have been filled with anticipation for Tolhurst, but she has used that to her advantage as much as possible. One of her aces in the hole, that she has been working on since Regionals, is a new vault. With a switch from a tuck-half finish to a pike-half finish, the upgrade should make a distinct impression on part of the judges if she "sticks it."

A finish in the Sweet 16 in the all-around, and a Great Eight performance on the vault, are the goals Tolhurst will be shooting for. Making it to the finals in the all-around might be a bit out of reach, due to the incredible talent of the athletes in front of her, but the individual events are what are going to pace her success.

For Tolhurst herself, just taking the magnanimity of the National Championship in stride is the key for her overall mindset. With the atmosphere centering on the highest competition level of the year, she has been taking it all in, and been putting her year in proper perspective.

"If I take one thing at a time, relax and do what I know I can do, I think I have a really good chance for the vault finals," Tolhurst said.

"This year has definitely been a great gymnastics year for me. I have been more consistent and gotten a lot stronger, and that is one thing Dave has been great in helping me with."

J.J. Tolhurst will try to become the first UMass All-American since Tammy Marshall (1993) when she competes in the NCAA championships tonight in Georgia.

Minutemen's defensive pride is back

By Matt Voutour
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE — It's pride was injured. After giving up a season high 16 goals in a frustrating loss to Delaware on Saturday, the Massachusetts lacrosse team's defense was frustrated, but accepted the blame for the loss.

Yesterday, when that defense stepped on the field in a must-win situation against Harvard, the pride was back. The unit played like it had throughout the first five games when it successfully limited some of the nation's top offenses.

"The defense as a unit, we take the blame for last week. If we want to compete top ten, we have to play fundamental," said junior Dennis Kelly. "This week we went back to basics. We have goals and if we want to get there, the defense has to get us there."

First–year head coach Greg Cannella was pleased with the performance.

"We played real hard defense, and did a nice job," Cannella said. "Harvard has three real good attackmen and some strong [midfielders]. I thought we did a real nice job with that."

With 2:10 left in the first quarter, senior Jared Lanning set the tone. A Harvard clearing pass found Jamie Ames, who had snuck behind the Massachusetts defense, and looked to have a clear break in on the UMass goal. Lanning sprinted to make up the 10 yards between himself and Ames, and stripped the ball free. The co–captain's play sent a message. There would be know easy chances for the Crimson.

The most obvious individual improvement between Saturday and yesterday, was that of goaltender Tom LoPresti. The senior goaltender was rusty against Delaware, after returning from an injury, and gave up 13 goals and was yanked from the game.

That rust was gone yesterday as LoPresti registered 13 saves in the game, including several impressive blocks on shots from close range.

"Tommy LoPresti did a real nice job getting back into it," Cannella said.

"I feel good. After last Saturday's game, the defense was down," LoPresti said. "Now we're back on track as you can see. We only gave up six goals against a good team."

While many players were frustrated by the messy weather conditions, LoPresti enjoyed the muddy field.

"A rainy day helps me out," LoPresti said. "[Opponents] don't get to plant their feet, and they can't shoot as hard. The rain is good for the goalies."

LoPresti's performance allowed the defense to take more chances.

"When he's on, our defense is top 10," Kelly said. "When he's sharp it allows me to be more aggressive, because I know he's going to save it."

"His play helps out the whole team," said senior defender Vin Dello–Iacono. "We need him to come up with saves. He's back on track and we have confidence in him."

Kelly points to the cohesiveness of the Minutemen defense as a key to its success.

"It's not just individuals, its a unit. We're one," Kelly said. "It's not Lanning and company or Vinny and company. It's UMass D. The six of us."

Dello–Iacono said that although the defense played well that he believes that the unit can still play better.

"We didn't play as well as we could play, we know that," Dello–Iacono said. "We're glad to have the W under our belt and we're back on track."

Player of the Game

Highlights...

The senior goaltender was impressive (13 saves) anchoring a Massachusetts defense that returned to form to hold the Crimson to six goals in the contest...Mike Valente had four assists in the contest, tying his season best, and moving him into seventh place all–time in career assists...Glass had his second five goal game of the season, and the third such game of his career. It was the fifth straight game that the sophomore All–America candidate has scored more than three goals...

mound. She practices very hard. She could throw for an hour straight, and never bat an eyelash. Her game face and practice face are the same," Sortino said.

Daut one for the books

Her numbers speak for themselves, in rather high volumes in both the school's record book and the conference laurels. Yet, as for Daut, she will not speak much about herself. Talk to her about goals, and the low key Daut will give them to you. Team goals, that is. No individual ones.

"I really want to go to the College World Series. It was the best feeling, and I didn't even play last time," Daut said.

In Daut's freshman season, the Minutewomen made it to the 1992 College World Series. She did not get a chance to pitch in the series, and she longs for another opportunity.

Regardless, Daut has made her impression, and there will always be proof.

"Kelly is one of the top pitchers we've had at UMass," Sortino said, "and the record book will prove that."

as co–captain's Lipsky and senior Keith Murray defeated Billone and Domini 8–5. Lipsky and Murray finished with a double's record of 4–2. The second double's match saw Hsiao and Lynn beat UNH's Basette and Merrill 8–2. They finished with a team best double's record of 6–2. The Minutemen completed their come–from–behind victory with an 8–2 win by Baishya and Aller over Luongo and Darryl Paisson.

UMass coach Judy Dixon and the team felt the importance of this match.

"UNH is a big rival for us. Not only are they a state school, but they recruit against us and we beat them for the first time since I've been with this program," she said. "We won the way that we should win. We won at the four, five, six and the double's point. The double's point was key. I said to these guys before they went on the court that the match is gonna be 4–3. I don't know who's gonna win, but it's gonna be a 4–3 match. And we got the double's point and we swept all three double's.

"The men's team knew all spring that this was the match they were peaking for, and rightfully so."

The Minutemen finished the regular season with a record of 6–5 and are heading to Piscataway, N.J. for the Atlantic 10 Championships this weekend and Dixon knows what she wants from her team.

"We came in seventh last year and I'd like to come in sixth, given our program, that would be a good step for us."

Eckert tucked in a Ferrucci feed at 14:31 in spite of great backchecking by Casey Costello.

UMass went ahead 4–2 on Glass' second of the game at 14:54, finishing a Valente cross and a play catalyzed by Dennis Kelly's accurate pass to Valente under pressure.

The teams traded goals in the second quarter, with Eckert cutting UMass' lead to one at 2:46, working his way into the crease from LoPresti's right and finding his five–hole.

Chris Grande took a Jay Robbins feed on Lyng's left and scored at 11:32 to put UMass ahead 5–3.

LoPresti and Lyng both made heroic efforts, and they did much of their finest work in the second. LoPresti stoned Eckert point blank at 7:17, and Lyng did the same to Murphy exactly three minutes later.

"The UMass attack is one of the quickest I've ever seen," said Lyng, who has made at least 13 saves in every game this year. "Once it's on their stick it's gone."

As the rain stopped, Harvard got back within one at 2:17 of the third, when Max von Zuben shed Triolo and beat LoPresti low, which was where he made most of his saves.

Mike DelPercio, the only regularly attacking freshman, scored a pretty and clutch goal at 5:24 to double the Minutemen's cushion to 6–4. Eric Bailey set up DelPercio at a tight angle to Lyng's right, and DelPercio shot one into the far top shelf.

Glass deflated Harvard with two more scores. At 13:49, he ripped off Lyng's clearing pass, scooped the ground ball and capitalized on one of Lyng's few obvious errors.

At 9:19 of the fourth, Bailey tossed a pass from behind the net on Lyng's right to Glass, who cut in for goal No. 5.

Gaffney scored from Spencer Rice to cut it to 8–5 at 13:12, then Eckert circled the crease and snuck one on LoPresti at 13:48, but it was not enough.

GEEZ.

That Woody Allen thing is still bothering me.

It makes me sad and confused.

I like Woody.

I mean, I mean when they go to the movies does she have to ask permission to go to the candy counter?

When they cross a busy street in Manhattan why does Woody hold her hand?

Boy he's really pushed the envelope this time.

But really, I'm just a 15 year old kid. What do I know about love or incest?

I think this is all about panty hose for Woody: COMFORT AND CONTROL.

Men's lacrosse outlasts No. 18 Harvard, 8–6

Defense shines; Glass nets five goals in rout

By Ted Kottler
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE— Harvard University may claim many superiors, but it doesn't have the best defense in New England men's lacrosse.

That distinction belongs to No. 14 UMass (4–3), which never trailed the No. 18 Crimson (4–5) in its 8–6 win yesterday at soggy Ohiri Field.

UMass	8
Harvard	6

Harvard mounted a respectable comeback, scoring two goals in 36 seconds to half UMass' 8–4 lead late in the game, but the Crimson only got one good look in the last 1:12, a shot by Steve Gaffney that sailed wide.

It was a low output for UMass, but not for Brendan Glass, whose five goals brought his team–high season total to 23.

Glass opened the account at 2:21 of the first quarter, when Mike Valente fed him a pass while Glass cut in front of Harvard goaltender Rob Lyng (17 saves).

"I give credit to the guys who fed the ball, I was just moving," Glass said.

Jeremy Murphy, gimpy left knee and all, got all the footing he needed for a behind–the–head fastball upstairs that caught Lyng looking at 5:52. Valente again assisted, and his three handouts on the day brought his career total to 81, good for sole possession of seventh place on the school's all–time charts.

Glass converted an Eric Triolo feed at 7:42 for a 3–0 lead, beating Lyng with an ankle–high shot.

Tom LoPresti (13 saves) shook off the cobwebs from Saturday's loss to Delaware, and one of his nicest denials came at 9:12, when he kicked away a Mike Ferrucci shot.

Just 25 seconds later, Jamie Ames scored his team–high 28th goal with a sidearm shot from LoPresti's right.

Jared Lanning sped back on defense to thwart a breakaway bid for Ames at 12:50, which seemed to spark UMass, as it allowed only three goals until Harvard's last ditch charge.

"We played real hard defense and Tommy was great," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

One goal came quickly, as Mike

The Minutemen defeated a tough Harvard Crimson squad yesterday, 8–6, in a battle of top 20 teams.

Minutemen pound URI in rain delayed affair

By Arthur Stapleton Jr.
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts pitching staff ace Jay Murphy is accustomed to finishing the games he starts, not the ones his teammates do. Yet against the University of Rhode Island yesterday, the senior righthander saved the Minutemen and starter Adrian Sofiic, en route to an 11–4 victory over the Rams at Earl Lorden Field.

UMass	11
URI	4

Massachusetts improves its record to 19–8 (12–3 in the Atlantic 10), while Rhode Island falls to 9–19 (3–9 in the A– 10).

Softic (1–1) began the sixth inning, but after URI's Kevin Lanzilli singled, centerfielder Adam Kessner was hit by a pitch and leftfielder Matt Olney walked to load the bases, he was relieved by righthander Eric Huliand.

Hulland issued a base–on–balls to pinch hitter Steve Cote, forcing Lanzilli home and cutting the Massachusetts lead to 6–3. Massachusetts coach Mike Stone saw enough and went with his best pitcher, Murphy, in a key situation.

"We had to get this win. In that situation, I had to go with my best guy. I can't take the chance of another walk," Stone said. "So that's why I brought him in. You have to go with your best in clutch situations and he did a great job."

After forcing a runner at home on a suicide squeeze attempt by shortstop Kevin Patti, Murphy induced URI's leadoff man John Esainko into a 6–4–3 double play that ended the inning.

With Murphy's sudden success in relief, does he plan on asking Stone to use him out of the bullpen for good?

"I like to pitch," Murphy said. "I love starting the games and just having the whole game to myself. I love to go in when the pressure's on, bases loaded and no outs. I like tight situations, whether it is a starting role or in relief, so it doesn't matter to me."

"You look at the school and the size of it, and the people who've come here, knowing you're a part of the history of UMass, it's an honor," Knight said.

As far as getting the record for himself, Knight said he wants it, but winning conference games is more important.

"Thank God, it was a relief [to hit the tying HR]," Knight said, "But I definitely want the one to break it, the one to get it done, to be by myself."

Massachusetts jumped on Rhode Island starter Don Smith in the first inning. With one out, second baseman Muchie Dagliere lined a chalk–raising double down the rightfield line and advanced to third on a single by Nelson Ubaldo. Knight hit into a fielder's choice at second, plating Dagliere and giving the Minutemen a 1–0 advantage.

In the second stanza, Massachusetts centerfielder Nate

UMass gymnasts head for tournament

• Tolhurst hoping to get all–around title •Frosh Schwartz competes in still rings

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

A career of hard work and a year from her last appearance in the NCAA Championships, will culminate tonight for J.J. Tolhurst. In Athens, Ga., the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics all–arounder will be in the national spotlight, as she looks to be the first gym All–American for UMass since Tammy Marshall two years ago.

The Georgia Coliseum will be packed with 10,500 screaming fans, as both 12 teams and 12 individual all–arounders will be vying for the top accolades in the sport; the National team title and First Team All–American status in the respective events.

The best in the nation will be surrounding Tolhurst, in both the competition and workout day. The press hype will be there on media day, as the Northeast Regional all–around champion will be working out with the No. 1 rated gymnast in the country, Jenny Hanson from No. 1 nationally ranked Georgia, and top teams in No. 3 Alabama and No. 5 Michigan. From the Northeast Region, the team champions in the form of the Lady Nitanny Lions from Penn State will also be with the lone Minutewoman representative.

With all the exposure though, Tolhurst and UMass coach Dave Kuzara both feel confident about her chances in bringing home some post–season hardware. Everything has seemed to fall in place, and at the right time of the year, especially with two weeks of good workouts in hand.

"My first goal this year was for the team to reach the Nationals," Tolhurst said, in her traditional manner of putting the team first. "But if the team did not go, I wanted to try to make it to Nationals once again."

"Getting to this point where she can be competitive in this type of group is the key," Kuzara said. "Her skill level is there on every event, it's just that not everyone can do what she does on vault, and vice versa with her on the bars.

"She is going to open a lot of people's eyes when we get there, because she is going in with little hype. Which is the way you want to go into a National Championship, very confident and very much in control."

Last year, while Tolhurst was still at George Washington University, she qualified regionally for the National all– around competition. With the strong performance and

Tonight at the NCAA Gymnastics Championships held at Ohio State, University of Massachusetts freshman Kevin Schwartz will compete on the still rings and try to become a national champion.

Such a statement would have been thought unrealistic at the start of the season, but Schwartz has made that dream come to fruition.

"I didn't think I could accomplish this at the start of the season," Schwartz said. "I did win the Junior Nationals the last three years, but I didn't think I could compete with the big guys right away."

Schwartz has not only competed with the big guns in the college ranks, he is the one whom they have shooting for all season. Except for two occasions the entire year, Schwartz has been ranked first in the country. When he was not ranked in the top spot, he has slipped down only to the number two position.

"He has put up consistent numbers all year," Massachusetts coach Roy Johnson said of Schwartz. "His scores have been in the 9.85, 9.90 range all season. That is a real accomplishment to be that consistent with your routine. He doesn't have to go out and shoot for his personal best in this meet because the scores he has put up could win the meet."

There are an abundance of athletes that can be recognized by sight any where they go. Others go largely unnoticed as they seem to just blend into the crowd. But Schwartz fits into the latter category, but he doesn't seem to mind. He realizes that when he is competing everyone knows who he is.

Last week at the NCAA regionals, Schwartz scored a 9.85 on the still rings. That score was good enough for third place overall in the meet. He will be in the number one individual qualifiers position for the event.

"He is an great shape," Johnson said. "First place qualifier is a great place to be in. It's an early draw, but all the judges know who he is and keep in mind that he is coming up to perform."

The pressure to perform at the highest level in front of 10,000 people, while there are other routines going on around you, can be enough

Women's tennis finishes season; future still bright

By Mike Brown
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's tennis team ended their season this past weekend at the Atlantic 10 tournament with great results and optimism for what the future holds.

The Minutewomen entered the tournament as the fifth seed and started off like a house on fire as they shut–out the fourth seeded Bonnies of St. Bonaventure University by the count of 9–0 in the quarterfinals.

Beginning the rout as always at No. 1 singles was UMass superstar Liesl Sitton. Sitton lost her first set 3–6, but bounced back to win the next two 6–1, 6–3.

Sitton set the tone with her victory. Her hard work and leadership influences her underclassmen teammates.

"I am very pleased with Liesl," UMass coach Judy Dixon said. "When you have a No. 1 that can fight and give anyone a match, it really means a lot to the kids playing below her."

Freshman Caroline Steele emerged as the No. 2 player for the team. Steele defeated her opponent in three sets as well, losing her first set 3–6, and then taking the next two sets 6–3, 6–2.

At the third spot in the Minutewomen line–up was freshman Lana Gorodetskaya. Gorodetskaya battled tough in the first contest escaping with a 7–5 victory and was then able to capture the second set, hence the match 6–2.

Batting clean–up for the squad was freshman Liz Durant. Durant came back strong, after sitting out the previous match versus Rhode Island, and won convincingly 6–2, 6–2.

The No. 5 void was filled by yet another freshman in Noelle Orsini. Orsini took the match to three sets before closing the door on her opponent and winning 7–6, 3–6, 6–2.

Ending singles play at the sixth spot was exchange student Catalina Mejia, as she fulfilled her duties

Senior hurler Kelly Daut has been "better than average" for the University of Massachusetts softball team over her four years.

Kelly Daut one for the record books

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

"She has her great days, and she has her average days, as well. Yesterday, she had an average day," Massachusetts softball coach Elaine Sortino said one day after senior Kelly Daut pitched the first of a double–header against Central Connecticut State last Tuesday.

That average day saw Daut pitch eight innings, give up five hits, let in one earned run, walk one batter, and throw a career–high 12 strikeouts. Numbers not to sneeze at.

"She had 12 strikeouts, but if you ask her, she'll tell you she had an average day. There wasn't any pop on the ball," Sortino said.

"It was just OK. I definitely think they should not have scored. It was just an average day," Daut said.

Switch that original statement to, "...an average day for Kelly Daut."

Two seasons in one

An average day for Kelly Daut goes against the true definition of average. But judging by the heights Daut has reached on the mound for the Minutewomen in her collegiate career, the accomplishments have normally been above average.

Especially in the climax season of her successful career, where Daut is now 16–5 on the season. What that does not show is how average her record sounded when she was 7–5 at the end of March. But then again, it does not exhibit how strong the competition was for Daut and the Minutewomen early in the season.

Of the five losses, all five teams have been or are one of the top 25 teams in the nation. Daut's losses have come to Cal State Fullerton (No. 4 this week) and Michigan twice (No. 9), as well as nationally–ranked Virginia and Florida State. Even with the setbacks in her first 12 games, Daut's earned run average was at 1.39.

"I don't know of any pitcher who has come off the kind of schedule we play against, she's got a 1.39 ERA," Sortino said prior to the first conference game earlier in the season. "It's usually 2.50, or 3.00, or 4.00."

Usually. But not with Daut.

Now, the right–hander is sporting a nine–game winning streak, and is undefeated in the month of April. With the 9–0 record since the Mar. 21 loss to Florida State (5–4), Daut's ERA has plummeted to 1.02. Four shutouts, four straight Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week awards and a UMass Athlete of the Week honor later, Daut is creeping up on one of the goals the coaching staff has set — a sub 1.00 ERA.

Daut almost not a Minutewoman

Sortino admits she worked "very hard" to get the Richboro, Pa. native. She remembers seeing Daut pitch 14 innings in a American Softball Association Tournament game, and get the win. She recalls seeing "great poise, great concentration, and a lot of potential" in the young Daut.

Sortino almost lost her to a Florida school. According to the Minutewoman coach, Daut declined on a Sunday night, and a day later, Daut's father called back accept the offer from Massachusetts.

And so, Sortino has seen Daut develop in her four years at Massachusetts. She has seen Daut pitch 92 games (58–34) thus far in her college career, and has seen Daut's game improve each year. In fact, Sortino sees certain factors in her development in the last two years.

"Her speed is 3–4 mph more than ever before," Sortino said. "The speed on her fastball makes her curveball better, and the curve is her bread and butter. The second thing is her rise ball, the up pitch. She's even got some called strikes with the rise ball. And at anytime in any place, Kelly can throw a good change up."

One thing that has not changed in Daut's arsenal is her work ethic.

"Kelly is a very focused and tough competitor on the

The University of Massachusetts men's tennis team finished the regular season on a high note with a 4–3 victory over the University of New Hampshire at the Upper Boyden Courts on Tuesday.

The Minutemen opened the match with three straight match losses. Senior Tim Lipsky lost for only the third time this season, 7–5, 3–6, 6–2, to New Hampshire's Brian Billone. Lipsky finished the regular season with a single's record of 6–3. Match two went to the Wildcats' Mike Domini as he defeated UMass sophomore Greg Hsiao in straight sets 6–4, 6–4. The third and final Wildcats win came when Marc Basette beat Minutemen sophomore Ankur Baishya 2–6, 6–1, 6–3. Baishya finishes the season with a record of 3–5.

The Minutemen rebounded from their three opening match losses with a victory by Justin Lynn over Gregg Luongo in straight sets 6–1, 6–1. Lynn finished a strong junior season with a record of 8–2. Junior Darren Tow pulled the Minutemen to within one with a 6–2, 6–3 win over New Hampshire's Jason White. Freshman Alex Aller capped off a remarkable rookie season and tied the match with a 6–1, 6–0 win over Jason Merrill. Aller finished the year with a team best single's record of 8–1.

Suspects, answers still being sought in Oklahoma bombing

By Sharon Cohen
Associated Press

OKLAHOMA CITY — Moving swiftly to solve the worst U.S. bombing in nearly 70 years, the FBI announced yesterday it is looking for two men suspected of renting the truck that was packed with a half–ton of explosives and blown up outside the federal building.

In London, a third man, described by U.S. officials as a possible witness in the attack, was put on a plane back to the United States for questioning. Italian officials said his bags, seized in Rome, contained possible bomb–making tools.

With the death toll remaining at 36 for most of the day, rescue teams suspended the search for survivors so they could shore up the broken concrete and steel of the nine–story Alfred P. Murrah Building, ripped apart by a car bomb Wednesday morning.

FBI Agent Weldon Kennedy said arrest warrants have been issued for two white men suspected of using aliases to rent the truck used in the bombing. The men's identities were not known, he said. In Washington, Attorney General Janet Reno announced a $2 million reward for information leading to arrests in the case. The government has received calls from several people saying they were from various Muslim groups and claiming responsibility for the bombing.

The bombing was the deadliest on U.S. soil since 1927, when a man fearful he couldn't pay his property taxes lined a school near Lansing, Mich. with dynamite and blew it up. Forty–five people, 38 of them children, were killed.

Some Arab–American organizations expressed concern about a backlash and said it was unfair to implicate Muslims.

"Whoever did this, regardless of their religion or ethnic background, is no more than an animal," said Nihad Awad, president of the Council on American–Islamic Relations in Washington. "Crimes have no lineage."

In Washington, President Clinton called on Americans not to "jump to any conclusions" about the culprits. "This is not a question of anybody's country of origin. This is not a question of anybody's religion. This was murder, this was evil, this was wrong. Human beings everywhere, all over the world, will condemn this out of their own religious convictions."

Investigators said the truck was rented April 17, packed with fuel–and–fertilizer explosives and parked outside the building, where the blast tore away half the structure and blew a crater 8 feet deep and 30 feet across.

An axle believed to have come from the vehicle was found about two blocks from the bombing scene, said a police source who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Board of Health votes to modify smoking ban

By Tim White
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — The Board of Health decided in a 2 –1 vote to modify Northampton's smoking ban on restaurants earlier this week.

The new limits will go into effect May 1 and they are in response to a lawsuit the local restaurant owners placed on the town. The suit was an attempt to eliminate the ban that currently does not allow smoking in restaurants.

Under the modified rules, restaurants will be allowed to permit smoking in a separate area that is well ventilated. No one under the age of 18 will be allowed in the smoking rooms.

Bars will still be allowed to permit smoking with a limited food menu that consists of grill items and sandwiches.

Restaurants can "become" bars at night when food is no longer being served. The business must apply for a waiver to the rules.

According to Dr. Anne Bures, a member of the board who voted against the alteration to the ban, some bars may still choose to not allow smoking just because it will be easier.

"[The restaurant owner] has to have separate ventilation, a separate room and a separate entrance so non–smokers wouldn't have any impact [from the smoke]," Bures said. "Very few restaurants may choose to do that."

She said one possibility as to why the board passed the alteration is because it was very difficult for the health department to maintain the other sections they cover when they were dealing with the influx of comments about this situation.

"In reality, the Board of Health members were spending a great deal of time dealing with this issue — phone calls and lawsuits were taking up a lot of time," Bures said. "They have so many other responsibilities."

Another reason for the strict ban faltering in Northampton is there was not much support from the political community, according to Bures.

"There was not very much political leadership in support of the ban ... not much support from the mayor or the chairman for city council in supplementing the ban," Bures said.

Jerry Jolly, manager of Seasons restaurant, the Pub and Rafters, said the altering of the ban in Northampton makes it unfair for the businesses in Amherst.

UMass lobbying could pay off

House budget brings windfall after accounting mistake fo

By Jessica Taverna

One week after University of Massachusetts students and faculty spent a day in Boston lobbying for increased funds, the university system is looking at a potential $4.5 million increase in funding for next year, from its original budget of $137.1 million.

Approximately half of the $4.5 million will go to the Amherst campus, at somewhere around $2 million, according to State Rep. Ellen Story (D–Amherst).

The increase was tagged onto the House's proposed $165 million budget for the Amherst campus, after the Ways and Means Committee discovered an accounting error that left them with surplus money to allocate, according to Barbara Pitoniak, spokesperson for the University.

The House found $35 million last week and allotted 25 percent of it to higher education, Story said.

The legislature's quick response in allocating excess funds to the University, even though there were so many other different interest groups, was s sign that lobbying had made a difference, Story said.

"The fact that money was given to higher education the day after a lobbying campaign is no coincidence," said Steven Cohen, a representative from the Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy (SCERA).

The administration does not plan on easing–u legislature yet, though, according to Chancellor J Scott.

"We're moving in the right direction, and it's si that higher education was on the front burner v money became available," Scott said.

The budget will be debated in the state Senat and they are hoping to come to a decision by June ing to State Sen. Stan Rosenberg (D–Amherst).

While the university system continues to strii original goal of a $21.7 million increase, the campus is still hoping to get the $10 million incr it originally asked for, Rosenberg said.

If UMass lobbying efforts continue at tl momentum that they have been going, it may j pen.

Initially, $4.6 million was going to be given tc tem, and it was all going to get funneled to th Medical Center in Worcester.

There was discussion about distributing the $ lion to all of the five campuses, but when the u system's budget increased to $9.1 million, the center was allowed to keep the $4.6 million and million was set to be split up among the remain puses, Story said.

Although Story referred to the House budget a cess," Rosenburg said that it is impossible to tell happen in the Senate.

Students go into Amherst to clean up the community

By Purva Pandey

University of Massachusetts students, faculty, staff and alumni will collaborate with Amherst residents and town employees on Saturday for the third annual "Into Amherst" service day.

Throughout the day, volunteers will clean up and beautify public areas around Amherst, including schools, town pools, community agency properties and conservation trails.

The event, which will mark the 25th anniversary of Earth Day, is a collective effort of the Vitally Involved in Voluntary Action (VIVA) Community Service at UMass and the town of Amherst.

VIVA anticipates 300 volunteers.

"We've actually had to turn groups away because there just aren't enough sites around Amherst," said Jeff Cullen, a VIVA board member and Housing Services employee.

The event is aimed at promoting community service and campus pride at UMass, as well as providing participants with "inter–generational experiences," said David Schimmel, Chair of the VIVA Council.

"Into Amherst" is an opportunity to reverse the "bad rap" that students living in Amherst often get with community residents, according to Cullen.

"Into Amherst" will begin at the Amherst Town Common with a breakfast sponsored by the Lord Jeffrey Inn and Nancy Jane's Restaurant.

"I think it's important that the local community and businesses support the students; the students are supporting us by taking the time to clean up the community," said Nancy Latuca, owner of Nancy Jane's Restaurant.

After the day's activities, participants will meet at a celebration at Bangs Community Center, sponsored by Stop & Shop, Pepsi–Cola, Bertucci's, Pizza Hut, Antonio's Pizza, Bruno's Pizza and Subway.

RSO gives ALANA students chance to get into television

By Nona Chiang
Collegian Correspondent

Students of color with an interest in creating, producing, directing or even starring in a television show, even a personally–designed show, are being offered chances to put this interest into practice.

Both video and television learning opportunities are part of an ALANA (African, Latino(a), Asian, Native, American) organization, the ALANA Video Project (AVP).

The ALANA Video Project is a registered student organization which recruits and trains members of the ALANA community in various aspects of video and television production.

Most University of Massachusetts students are familiar with the Union Video Center (UVC), which broadcasts on Channel 19 on the UMass Cable Station. UVC is a fully equipped production studio, complete with cameras, audio mixers, editing equipment, and much more.

However, according to Monique Johnson of the ALANA Video Project, prior to the establishment of this organization "a lot of minority students were not going to UVC."

According to Johnson, the ALANA Video Project seeks to increase the involvement of minority students in the production of student shows which air on Channel 19. The ALANA Video Project uses UVC as "a gateway, a place where students can get fully trained in the area of video and television production," said Johnson.

With the help of the ALANA Video Project, at least two shows which air on Channel 19 have been produced. Room 307 airs on Monday and Wednesday evenings. The show is primarily a music video show which also conducts occasional interviews with members of the UMass community. Another music video show, Just Kickin' It, began taping recently and should be on the air shortly, Johnson said.

"We give them the training to do what they want to do,"

Speaker tells story of how Christianity changed his life

By Amy Paradysz
Collegian Staff

Christ can change lives, according to a Christian speaker who used the conversion of his alcoholic father as an example in a lecture Wednesday night in the Student Union Ballroom.

Josh McDowell, a traveling representative for Campus Crusade for Christ, gave his speech, "A Skeptic's Quest" to more than 500, and promised to send them all literature about Christianity.

"We think that people need to hear what he has to say," said Michelle Rook, a member of Campus Crusade for Christ. The Crusade is the registered student organization that sponsored McDowell's appearance.

McDowell said that one of the most significant changes in his own life after he became a Christian was in his relationship with his father.

"In high school, I'd go out to the barn and see my mother beaten so badly she couldn't get up, lying in the manure behind the cows," McDowell said.

McDowell said his mother told him she had lost the will to live. She died two months later, and McDowell said he blamed his father.

In college, a small Christian group challenged McDowell to intellectually refute Christianity. McDowell, who took the challenge because he was sick of Christians, became one himself.

"There's a certain joy in harboring hatred," said McDowell. But once he became a Christian, McDowell told his father that he loved him.

Soon afterwards, McDowell was in a serious car accident and his father visited him in the hospital. "It was one of the few times I ever saw my father sober," said McDowell.

His father asked, "Son, how can you love a father like me?"

McDowell said, "Dad, six months ago I despised you," and then he told him about Christ.

Because of the change he had seen in his son's life, the town drunk prayed a simple prayer.

"My Dad only touched whiskey once after that," said McDowell. Although his father died only 14 months later, McDowell claims that over 100 residents of his home town committed their lives to Christ because of the change in their town alcoholic.

McDowell told the story of how his attempt to disprove Christianity led to him to intellectually believe in Christ.

"The resurrection was the one issue I tried to refute more than anything else," said McDonald. But he says he found historical evidence that the stone in front of the tomb weighed one or two tons, and that Christ was wrapped in a 117–pound encasement and guarded by 16 Roman soldiers. Plus, there was a metal seal, an authenticating device, on the entrance.

New fair gives a taste of Amherst

By Gina Larson
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The local restaurants of Amherst are cooking up big plans this year to bring the town the biggest "Taste of Amherst" yet.

Organizers and restaurant owners have agreed that the success of the event has warranted its own weekend.

The Taste of Amherst, in the past, was held in conjunction with the Community Fair, situated on the Town Common.

Judie Terapulsky, owner of Judie's Restaurant, said that the decision to showcase local restaurants on a separate weekend came about from complaints made by non-profit groups who were trying to fund-raise with food stands of their own.

"Because of the 'Taste' even some of the vendors were coming over to the sidewalk sales," Terapulsky said.

In response, organizers agreed to hold the Taste of Amherst the weekend prior to the fair, running from May 4– 7.

And why not?

"Spring has sprung and everyone is dying to get out and walk around town," Terapulsky said.

Even without the fair, organizers of the event have added a few ingredients of their own to spice up the weekend.

Entertainers such as balloon sculptors, magicians, cartoon caricature artists and stilt-walkers will parade the streets and a jazz band has been scheduled to perform Saturday evening in front of Fleet Bank, Terapulsky stated.

Organizers of the event have also donated free space to non-profit groups who will join in the festivities. The First Congregational Pre-school has agreed to raise money by face-painting and cookbooks will be sold for Hospice.

All of the food that will be sold, Terapulsky said, will be tastefully priced at $2.50 or under.

The menu itself is as diverse as the restaurants of Amherst. The fare will consist of everything from Mexican to Chinese, to Caribbean cuisine.

Joining the Taste of Amherst this year will be the two newest additions to Amherst itself. Sugar Jones will be serving cookies and Rao's Cafe has offered to sell muffins and coffee.

Town officials have agreed to organizers' requests to allow the local restaurants to close half of North Pleasant Street, taking traffic down to only lane and to also close the meters from Chouster to the Douglas Funeral Home.

Teraspulsky said the extra room will be used to move the vendors out into the streets so that three different food courts can be set up to facilitate the crowds.

Another change in the format of this year's Taste of Amherst is that all of the vendors will be located on one side of the street.

"We want to relocate all of the restaurants to the side of Antonio's. That way, we can have people walking the length of the town. This is a great opportunity to have people get to know the town," Terapulsky said.

■ ban

"Hadley doesn't have [any ban], Sunderland doesn't have anything, Belchertown doesn't have anything," Jolly said. "We're going to ask the [Amherst] Board of Health to put us on a level playing field with the surrounding communities, or make it a state law."

Jolly said several owners from bars around Amherst are meeting with the Health Department on May 17 to attempt to rescind the law that will go into effect July 1. The law will completely eliminate smoking in bars.

Currently, people are allowed to smoke in bars, and Jolly said he had to put in $5,000 worth of ventilation equipment in the Pub to allow smoking when the restaurant makes the switch into a bar for the evening.

Jolly said the restaurants will not be pursuing the board to allow smoking sections back in the restaurants.

Bures said the ban alteration in Northampton still does not address the issue of the employees' health working in the smoking environment.

"The evidence shows that second hand smoke is hazardous to people's health," Bures said. "We made steps in eliminating second hand smoke and we should try to maintain that."

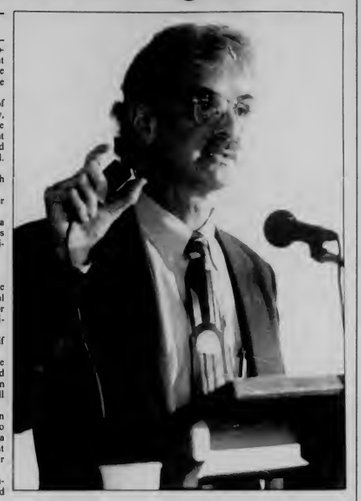
Slime mold could bring new cure

By Purva Panday
Collegian Staff



DAYMON SMITH / COLLEGIAN
Prof. Bruce S. Jacobson told a crowd of over 100 Tuesday afternoon about his theory for a cure for cancer.

A University of Massachusetts professor lectured Tuesday afternoon at Memorial Hall on a new approach he is studying to possibly finding a cure for cancer.

Bruce S. Jacobson, a professor of biochemistry and molecular biology, gave a talk entitled "From Slime Mold, Floor Polish and Antiperspirant Towards a Cure for Cancer," based on a decade's research on slime mold. Approximately 100 people attended.

Jacobson said he chose to work with slime mold because it is easy to grow.

"You can grow slime mold in your backyard," said Jacobson.

Jacobson's research has resulted in a theory for isolating plasma membranes around cells and mapping the significant proteins located there, he said.

Attempts to kill cancer cells

Jacobson spoke of his extensive research in which he used essential ingredients found in non-stick floor polish and antiperspirant to "laminate" cells by coating them.

"You can build several coatings if you want to," Jacobson said.

The procedure allows the researchers to divide the coated membrane and derive information about the proteins that control cell functions, Jacobson said.

Jacobson and his team were then able to use the same technique to study blood vessel cells that play a paramount role in the development and nourishment of solid cancer tumors in animals.

"We want to kill the plasma without killing the regular tissue," said Jacobson.

Jacobson is now using the research to try and formulate several ways to kill solid tumors. One approach is to create toxic antibodies that travel specifically to the tumor which kill the blood vessel cells in and around the malignancy, ultimately cutting off its blood supply.

"The idea is that if we can knock out the blood vessels we can shrink and kill the tumor," Jacobson said.

This technique defeats barriers associated with the "magic –bullet" technique that delivers a toxin directly to antigens (simulators of anti–body production) on tumor cells, according to Jacobson.

Usually, blood vessels act as "bullet proof vests" to fight off such toxins, but now it could be possible for toxic antibodies to target tumor blood vessels and kill them, destroying the tumor, Jacobson said.

Conclusion of gratitude

Jacobson conclude by thanking his student and faculty researchers. He specifically stressed the "importance and dedication of undergraduate research."

Chancellor David K. Scott presented Jacobson with the Chancellor's Medal for Distinguished Service at the University.

"Professor Jacobson brings science to the lay person," said Bish Ganguly, a molecular and cell biology graduate student. "He makes the tie–ins consistently with cancer and big concepts."

Dean of the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics Linda Slakey said, "I always think his work is fascinating. I enjoy his ability to make the complicated clear to the people."

However, some audience members did not echo the same sentiment. Some found the talk confusing and complicated, where others understood the quick, technical and intricate details of Jacobson's talk.

Within the next five years, Jacobson plans to apply for a license from the Food and Drug Administration for an "Investigative New Drug," which legally allows for researchers to test new therapies on terminal cancer patients.

"Research relates to teaching as well as what we might find in the future," said Jacobson.

Jacobson's lecture concluded the 1994–95 Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series.

The talk marked a landmark 21 years of the program, which is sponsored by the Chancellor's Office and the UMass Alumni Association.

"The program offers the opportunity for some of our brightest faculty to share their information with us," said Mary Weidensaul, executive financial officer at the Chancellor's Office.

Prof speaks of Western view of Africa

By Ekra Miezan
Collegian Correspondent

"What is right with Africa?" was the topic Dr. Michael Chege, a native of Kenya and a graduate of the University of California at Berkeley, discussed at Hampshire College.

Chege, who resides in Zimbabwe, is also a visiting scholar at the Center for International Affairs at Harvard University.

"Media images of Africa is one of gloom, pessimism and death," Chege said, drawing upon an article written by Kaplan in the Atlantic Monthly. For Kaplan, Chege argued, there is a coming anarchy in Africa. Kaplan, who has traveled on the coast of West Africa, has selectively but vividly written about distressing stories about the plight of Africa, and has painted the continent as commonly besieged by these miseries.

For the past few months, Chege has been living in the United States and has seen more depressing images about Africa in the media than he had when he was in Zimbabwe. This is a very one–sided representation of Africa," he said. "Africa is the good, the bad and everything between," he added. If we come to grasp the differences between African countries, we can begin to look for solutions to the problems each country is facing, he said.

According to Chege, Hollywood has its representation of Africa. Hollywood uses Kenya as the icon of Africa. The Lion King, the children's movie, is a "butchery of Swahili," he said.

On the other hand, there are Africans who blame Western colonialism and imperialism for the problems in Africa, Chege argued. "This is also one–sided," he underlined. "If you don't accept what is going wrong, you are doing propaganda," he said.

Chege also discussed the issues of leadership, environment, population, conflicts and economic development.. "Considering Africa a place of too many dictators is a partial view," he said. "It is true that there are dictators in Africa. Mobutu (Zaire), Mbiya (Cameroon), etc., are nasty characters."

But, "how are we to forget all the good in a continent that produced Nelson Mandela, the kind of people who are prepared to go beyond their own personal suffering and ambition for the interest of a nation," Chege said. "Leaders lead people through difficulties," he added, "And Nelson Mandela is the most significant human being at the turn of this century."

According to Chege, there have been positive political changes in Africa. Countries which never had a democratic system in the colonial period are now democratic. Malawi previously had a terrible dictatorship. "The people of Malawi have peacefully elected a democratic government. So did Madagascar and South Africa," he added.

Recognition of ethnicity has been one of the positive changes in Africa Chege has observed. "For long African leaders had believed they could transcend ethnicity and create a unifying identity. This has failed. Erythrea has fought against and won its independence and ethnic identity from Ethiopia," he said.

In Chege's view, Uganda has given more power to the local authorities and kingdoms. He said he believes that there may be more changes in national boundaries in the future and people will live in peace. "It is unlikely that Sudan will remain one country," he said.

Chege has observed that population growth in Africa does not necessarily mean that the environment has to suffer. There are cases in Africa where population growth has also led to environmental growth. Such is the case of Machakoze, located at 15 miles of Nairobi. Burkina Fasso, West Africa, has been planting trees to stop the dessert, Chege said. "Camp fire has been successful environmental program led by the rural people in Zimbabwe."

Chege argued that it is a partial view to think that Africa no longer plays a vital role in the world economy. "When one looks at specific items," he said, "Africa still plays some key role." Kenya, for instance, is a leading producer of tea of high quality which is used to blend other teas. The Ivory Coast is still a major producer of coffee. Tourism, Chege underlined, is a potential area of economic growth.

During the question and answer session, questions were raised about Panafricanism and African unity, women's rule in economic development, and the devaluation of the West African currency (CFA).

Chege stated that he is a strong believer in African unity. "Most of the decisions, however, about African unity have not been realistic," he said. "There cannot be a unity without internal development of individual countries." Chege acknowledged that individual development and integration should be simultaneous. "Policies which are good for individual countries should be good for regional grouping," he said.

McDowell realized there was no way he could disprove the resurrection, he said.

In three days the tomb' was empty except for the grave clothes which had collapsed, said McDowell.

"The Jews themselves confirm the tomb was empty," McDowell said, "so as far as I'm concerned the question is not whether or not the tomb was empty, but how it got empty."

Since his conversion, McDowell has given 22,000 speeches at 700 colleges and universities in 84 countries. He has written 52 books, many of which were sold at the speech.

One of those books, A Ready Defense, includes an almost word for word version of the "Skeptic's Quest" speech McDowell gave in the Student Union Ballroom.

Kirk Irwin, a member of Campus Crusade, said, "We want to get out the message of who Jesus Christ is to the UMass community, but we also want to show how the resurrection of Christ affects a person's life."

Make love, not war

Richard Gilluly

The attitudes that lead to widespread violence by Americans are so omnipresent we hardly notice them. For instance, many of us somehow found it appropriate, even emotionally satisfying, when we bombed a Third World nation, Iraq, but we were appalled by the brutal murders committed by a Jeffrey Dahmer — just as if there were no connection between the two.

James W. Prescott, a former National Institutes of Health neuropsychologist who writes about human violence, believes deprivation of mutually affectionate bodily pleasure is the prime source of human violence, and he blames especially the denial of such pleasure to infants and young children. Cultures that frown on such expressions of affection, he believes, almost inevitably are violent cultures.

Prescott bases his beliefs both on anthropologists' reports and on physiological studies which indicate direct links in the brain between capacity for bodily pleasure and absence of tendencies towards violent behavior. Each kind of culture has other characteristic traits, as well.

In non-violent cultures (such as the Hopi Indians), for instance, parents lavish physical affection on children and do not punish them physically; women are given equal status instead of being treated as property; economic life is conducted cooperatively instead of competitively; and the gods (if any) that are worshipped are seen as kindly rather than as cruel. Sexual codes in these cultures tend to be permissive.

Violent, warlike cultures tend to have the opposite traits.

Well, some readers may respond, isn't America a culture that, in fact, does place high value on bodily pleasure, to the point where there is a national obsession with sex, as reflected everywhere from MTV to sex-with-violence movies. Indeed, don't sex and violence go together?

But the kind of sex often glorified in America is mutual masturbation, a genitals-only transaction devoid of affection or caring. Like the homosexual relationships in prisons in which dominant and submissive sexual roles are based on hierarchies among prisoners, sex here too often really is about power — and thus about violence.

Affectionate bodily interactions which lead to deep bonding between participants — whether these be mother and child or adult sexual partners — are the kind which offer an antidote to violence, Prescott believes. Affectionate treatment of children is, of course, more common in America than it used to be, a hopeful sign.

But I think these issues have another dimension, one Prescott doesn't explore as deeply. The violent societies, including ours, are highly blaming, punitive ones. But the punishment and blame, aimed most often at people lowest in the social hierarchy, don't reduce the violence, they make it worse.

Cruel prisons of the usual American kind brutalize inmates and promote violent crime rather than reduce it. Likewise, most mass killers, such as Jeffrey Dahmer, were subjected to severe physical abuse as children.

Blame and punishment in the United States are power games in which the poor almost always are the losers. Newt Gingrich wants to punish welfare mothers, some of the least powerful people in the society. Most of the occupants of our prisons come from severely deprived backgrounds.

Prescott suggests a powerful argument against official violence of all kinds, from paddlings in schools to executions and wars, on humane grounds. He envisions societies where people would be motivated to create together rather than be enemies, where the joys of physical affection and caring would eclipse the pains of exploitation and violence.

But there is a strictly practical argument against violence that is compelling, too. It is simply this: Violence rarely has any real efficacy in changing human behavior for the better.

Though it may seem in the short run to do so, that's an illusion. Generations of Iraqis, for instance, will remember the United States with hatred. They will be waiting for a chance to get even.

Defending the culture of America

Caleb Cochran

A woman in one of my classes made a comment the other day that really bothered me. "America has no culture," she said. She went on to explain that while other countries, religions and groups have a "culture," the United States of America does not. After I finished picking my jaw up off the ground, I did some thinking on the subject.

First of all, let's talk about "culture." The Oxford American Dictionary lists four definitions of "culture," and I think we should run through these briefly before continuing. All of the listings are nouns, in case you were wondering, and the first one reads, "The appreciation and understanding of literature, arts, music, etc."

OK: pop quiz. Which country is the homeland of Herman Melville, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry David Thoreau, Walt Whitman, Emily Dickinson, Edgar Allan Poe, Robert Frost, Mark Twain, Ernest Hemingway, Jack Kerouac, William Faulkner, Raymond Carver, Toni Morrison and James Tate? Give up? That's right, the good ol' United States of America, the land of the free and the home of no culture.

Here's another quick one. Name the home country of the following musicians: John Philip Sousa, Scott Joplin, Aaron Copeland, George Gershwin, Leonard Bernstein, Dizzy Gillespie, Ray Charles, Chuck Berry and Elvis Presley. I know, it's another toughie. Once again, it's the United States. I guess that first definition wasn't the one my classmate had in mind.

Let's try definition number two: "The customs and civilization of a particular people or group." This one isn't quite as cut and dried, but a few ideas pop into my head when I think of America in terms of customs and civilization. One custom that a lot of us celebrate in one way or another is the Fourth of July. Now, for all of you who have forgotten why we celebrate this day, let's go back to the 18th century.

On December 16, 1773, a group of patriots boarded British ships in Boston Harbor and dumped 342 chests of tea into the water. The "Boston Tea Party" was a protest of a new tea act imposed by the British onto the colonies. This marked the first act of open resistance by the colonists to British rule, and it effectively began the American Revolution.

Let's jump ahead to July 2, 1776. On this day, Congress voted for independence from Great Britain. Two days later (July 4, for all you math majors), Congress adopted the Declaration of Independence, prepared chiefly by Thomas Jefferson, and the fight for freedom was in full swing. That's why we celebrate the Fourth of July, and if you ask me, it's a pretty damn significant custom.

Need some more evidence of the advancement of civilization in America? Ponder the achievements of the following individuals for a moment: Thomas Paine, George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Thomas Edison, Eli Whitney, Henry Ford, Susan B. Anthony, Franklin D. Roosevelt, John F. Kennedy, Rosa Parks and Martin Luther King, Jr. All of these Americans have made significant contributions to the civilization, customs, and for lack of a better word, culture of the United States.

The culture of America, as with any country, has been shaped as much by its failures as by its successes. The Civil War certainly has contributed to American culture (didn't you ever wonder why southerners call you "Yankee?"). The Great Depression; the assassinations of the Kennedys, Martin Luther King, Jr. and Malcolm X; Vietnam; Watergate; the Iran-contra scandal — all of these events have helped form the culture that we Americans are all a part of. That's why Richard Nixon is more of a household name than James Polk, although the latter was a better president. That's why your grandparents still talk about the Depression as if it were yesterday. That's why J.F.K. is immortalized instead of merely respected. Just because the United States is only 219 years old doesn't mean that the country has no heroes to remember. It doesn't mean that there are no stories that have been passed down through the generations. And it most certainly does not mean that there is no such thing as American culture.

In case you were curious, definitions three and four in Oxford are as follows: "3. The cultivating of plants, the rearing of bees, silkworms, etc." As far as I know, we do this in America. "4. A quantity of bacteria grown for study." My dad, also an American, is a bacteriologist, and he assures me that this definition applies to America as well.

So, for all of you who want to sell me the theory that America has no culture, you can try someone else. I, for one, ain't buying.

Immaturity shows in courtroom

David K. Chan

Who isn't sick of the O.J. Simpson trial? Everyday the papers and television fills our heads with O.J. and more O.J. I myself lost interest and quickly got sick of this tabloid showered case. But what has gotten me even more sick of this trial is what happened last Thursday while prosecution witness Dennis Fung was on the stand.

Simpson's lawyer, Robert Shapiro, in an attempt to rattle Fung's credibility as a criminalist and a witness, proceeded to make facetious remarks about Fung, an Asian-American, while handing out Chinese fortune cookies.

To defame someone's credibility with racial slanders is cowardly and immature. As Mom used to say (and on occasion still says), "How old are we now?"

Mr. Shapiro, I thought you were better than this. I thought that there was a certain level of conduct that was expected in a courtroom. I figured such a prestigious lawyer as yourself would be familiar with this code. But I guess not. What were your intentions? To get the courtroom laughing? "Ha, ha, Mr. Fung is a fortune cookie, look at how stupid he looks."

Mr. Shapiro, your true colors have been revealed through your own actions. You and your defense team have been going around claiming that your client is a victim of racism from the prosecution while you yourself are racist as well. Smart move, counselor, real smart.

If Mr. Fung was black, would you have started up a picnic and served fried chicken and watermelon? Or if Mr. Fung was Mexican, would there be tacos for everyone? If these two scenarios had happened, there would have been an outcry large enough to overshadow this stupid trial.

Mr. Shapiro was a coward. His actions make him a coward because he did them in a courtroom that was obviously not predominantly Chinese. Would he have still slandered Mr. Fung if this was so? O.J. would probably be looking for another lawyer.

But to some credit, Mr. Shapiro did apologize a few days later. He was quoted as saying, "My heart has been heavy all weekend if even one person had been offended, and for that I sincerely apologize."

He even went on to shake hands with Mr. Fung after he finished his testimony a couple of days ago. That was nice of Mr. Shapiro. But that was expected, he had to save his reputation as a champion of oppressed minorities — certain minorities.

Mr. Shapiro was the one to make racism an issue in O.J.'s trial. But now he has shown that he has double standards. If Mr. Fung didn't have class, he wouldn't have shaken hands with Mr. Shapiro because I know I wouldn't have. I probably would've opted to shove those fortune cookies into his mouth instead.

Take that smirk off your face and show some class yourself, Mr. Shapiro. The O.J. trial has been nothing but witless tabloid news anyway, so don't start anymore.

Striking fear in hearts of the U.S.

Mark McGrath

Wednesday morning in Oklahoma City hundreds of regular American citizens went to work just as they always did. Many of these people worked in the Federal Building of that city and never could have dreamed they'd be leaving their homes for the last time.

A car bomb, estimated to have weighed more than a thousand pounds ripped through their workplace, the second floor of which was a child care center. The dead bodies are still being counted, and when all is said and done the death toll will be in the hundreds.

Terrorism, for the second time in the last two years has hit home. Although not necessarily linked with the bombing of the world trade center in 1993, this act has awakened many Americans to the fact that violence and horrific acts of terror are now taking place on our own soil and we, as Americans, are no longer safe.

Although we do not know yet exactly where to place the blame, this disaster was planned and carried out by a person or group of people whose intent was to sweep our country with fear and outrage. The responsible parties were initially successful in that matter, but their true, long-term success can be measured more accurately in the way we deal with that fear and outrage.

Terrorists who use techniques such as these do so in order to motivate their target to take a specific action. Otherwise the action would be completely senseless. In this case, the objectives are still unclear, but it is safe to assume that the bombers wish to instill a certain kind of fear in the hearts of Americans. At the same time, they may also wish to induce a quick reaction, which in the long run would be harmful to the United States and beneficial to their own cause.

In a situation such as this one, the immediate gut reaction is to come out swinging. That is the reaction the American people prefer. Otherwise we will be seen as weak, hardly an American trait. Many politicians know that, and are very willing to strike back quickly in order to please the people.

The problem with this way of thinking and acting is that there is no real, definite target at which we can strike back. There are only suspects.

In the mean time, it's up to us, the citizens of the United States to try and remain calm. That is a very difficult task, but the strength of this country should be seen in our restraint, not the rash actions we could take.

Evidence of the fear generated by such terrorist acts can be seen as close to home as the city of Boston. Yesterday, at least 15 buildings in the city received bomb threats, and several had to be evacuated. Those buildings included the JFK Federal Building and City Hall. Fortunately, all of these threats turned out to be hoaxes, but with situations the way they are, they could have very easily have become reality.

Fear is a very powerful emotion. Some would argue the most powerful. Through fear, anger and paranoia are easily generated. Natural reactions, as strong as they may be, must be checked.

Someone who's afraid is a prisoner, a prisoner to fear. It's true that terrorism has hit the heartland of America, proving that there is no safety from terrorist attacks, but to let these evil cowards cast a shadow over our lives is in itself a victory for them. It's only when we are free of fear that we are fully able to live our lives.

Talk looks at multiculturalism

Cross-cultural understanding discussed by variety of speakers

By Aimee Schwartz
Collegian Staff

EYE TO EYE: GAY AND LESBIAN, AFRO-AMERICAN AND JEWISH-AMERICAN WRITERS IN PERFORMANCE
Memorial Hall
April 19

African-American gay writer, Philip Robinson, and Jewish-American lesbian writer, Jyl Lynn Felman, discussed cross-cultural understanding and read some of their works in Memorial Hall at 7 p.m. last Wednesday.

"For me, the healing between Blacks and Jews is that we need to witness each other's stories, not criticize or comment, but be a real loving witness," said Felman.

Robinson, a graduate of Emerson College, received his Masters degree in Education in Counseling Psychology from Boston College in 1975.

He wrote a book titled Secret Passages, A Trilogy of Thought. In 1991, he received the Audre Lorde Award for Poetry, presented by the Greater Boston Lesbian/Gay Political Alliance.

Felman received her master's degree in fiction from the University of Massachusetts. Her book, Hot Chicken Wings, was considered in the 1993 Lambda Literary Finals. She now teaches a course, "Women in Culture and Society from a Multicultural Perspective," at Brandeis University.

Felman and Robinson have known each other for years. "When you work cross-culturally you have to get to know the other person's culture and identity. You have to have a relationship," said Felman.

Robinson stressed the importance of listening to each other by saying, "We are hearing each other because our language is such that we are able to hear each other. We are not alienating each other from what we are saying."

Robinson and Felman took turns reading their poetry.

"My work is statements of what I'm going through in my life," said Robinson.

Explaining that he lost eight friends to AIDS last year, Robinson put a lot of emotion into reading his poems titled, "Tribute, the Call: Nurturing the Spirits, and I Suffer Not Alone."

When Felman stood up to recite a poem she remarked, "It's a special type of historian that remembers all the dead."

Felman's poem, "Beyond Katah Alpha" or in English "Growing Up Jewish in the Midwest" tells about her experiences as a Jew.

Felman said she performed a "daily navigation back and forth from viability to invisibility." She said Jewish life was never mentioned outside her home.

"Resistance and ritual were inseparable from being a Jew. The rituals I love couldn't survive without constant acts of resistance," said Felman.

She explained that her oppression led her to become an ally of African-American people because they experienced similar acts of discrimination.

When Robinson stood up again, he read two poems. The first titled "The Beginning," tells of school children teasing each other because of their differences.

The other titled "My Name Is Silence" expressed his belief that people should not hide any part of themselves from others.

Felman also read a poem titled "De Vilde Chayes" or in English "The Wild Beast."

Robinson also read poems titled "Bicarious Thrust," "The Assault," and "When I Stop Kissing My Father."

U Win Maung demonstrated the graceful art of Burmese dancing at the Augusta Savage Gallery.

Burmese dancer exhibits talent

By Zaw Min Oo
Collegian Correspondent

U WIN MAUNG
Augusta Savage Gallery
April 19

Graceful movements typified U Win Maung's demonstration of the Burmese dance at the Augusta Savage Gallery Wednesday night, bringing recognition and insight to a form of dance not commonly known around the world.

As U Win Maung stepped on the makeshift stage, the audience looked rather misty-eyed by the glitter of the shiny costume he supported. Glamorous would best describe the intricate design as well the many color palettes on U Win Maung's dress.

When the music ignited with loud drum thumping, U Win Maung began to move with traditional wrist flicking and spinning motions, creating a certain type of hypnotic enchantment to his movements. The whole dance swayed the audience to wonder at its arcane appeal, having a unique combination of flare and charm brewed by the effeminate overtones of it all.

The performance consisted of five parts. The first was a demonstration to introduce the style of the Burmese dance. The fours other parts consisted of dances as well as U Win Maung's vocal accompaniment, noting Burmese artisan tradition in which theatermen would not be in professional ranks without other pertinent skills; particularly singing. The first vocal of "Shwe Mandalay" was likely to have the most emotion as the song reminisced the old glory days when the kingdom at Mandalay promoted the art tradition.

The second vocal was "Ayothia Gabi," praising the artisans in Thailand whose influences shaped Burmese dance. Following this was a performance intending a march of Burmese arts named "Gabi Thoul." U Win Maung's final vocal entitled "Man Shwebo" spoke about gold and its richness in Burmese lifestyle; especially in the Buddhist temples.

Founded by his father, U Win Maung's style of dance is an official branch of Shwe Man Thabin Troupe. This is the closest style you will get to the ancient dances performed back in the early Pagan era; or first Burmese kingdom. He described Burmese dance more importantly by describing the country first as "a nation of influences from India, China and Thailand."

He said that from these influences, "Burmese dance is formed, although it still has its own differences. The difference of the dance is that there is improvisation by the dancer him or herself to create an original style."

Burmese dance is always an interpretation so the dances do not always stay the same. Yet there are guidelines to follow such as the posture; so certain movements look similar. In the end, the dance along with the singing accompaniment becomes an enticing treat to those wanting to see something different.

U Win Maung's reputation proved unchanged as the small audience witnessed a magnificently rare performance by Burma's most revered dancer.

Sandra Bullock stars as a lonely Chicago subway employee in her new film While You Were Sleeping.

New movie hopes to be 'sleeper'

By John Horn
Associated Press

BURBANK, Calif. — Some Hollywood rules are best left unbroken: You shouldn't park in the studio chief's space, let Stallone do comedy or bank on a female star to open a movie.

Recent box-office returns prove that even the town's top women — from Sharon Stone (The Quick and the Dead) to Jessica Lange (Losing Isaiah) — can't guarantee ticket sales. So why do so many knowledgeable people think little-known Sandra Bullock's new film is going to be a big hit?

Leading into Friday's debut of Bullock's romantic comedy, While You Were Sleeping, the actress was seen only as a sidekick: She played second fiddle in Demolition Man and The Vanishing. Most people know her as "that girl who drove the bus in Speed."

While You Were Sleeping is her first prominent starring role, and she wasn't even the first choice — Demi Moore was. Furthermore, her supporting players in the new film, Bill Pullman and Peter Gallagher, are scarcely marquee names.

What makes While You Were Sleeping such a likely success rests more in the timing: It's the right movie at the right time. Disney is so confident in the film it is releasing it four months early — trying to lap the summer field a month before Memorial Day.

"Look, this is a picture that is working," says Roger Birnbaum, the film's co-producer. "But it doesn't have any big-name stars, and we have to be the first out of the pack. ... Disney said, 'Let's go now. Let's be the first romantic comedy out this year.'"

If the film had come out as planned in August, it could have disappeared in the late summer crush, its makers say. (Oddly enough, the film is set during Christmas.)

Bullock plays Lucy Moderatz, an unhappy and unattached Chicago subway token collector. One day she rescues a mugging victim (Gallagher) — a passenger she's previously admired from afar — who falls into a coma. Through a series of misunderstandings and deceptions, the victim's family comes to believe Moderatz is his fiancee.

Until he wakes up from the coma — or his suspicious brother (Pullman) uncovers her deceit — Moderatz is more or less engaged to the man of her dreams.

The movie originally had the unfortunate title Coma Guy. A rival studio complained without gain the story was a copy of its I Married a Dead Guy. Things did not go as smoothly in casting.

The makers of While You Were Sleeping asked Moore to play the lead role, but the Indecent Proposal star had a schedule conflict. A call went out to Bullock. With Speed freshly on her resume, Bullock's salary climbed from $500,000 to $1.2 million.

Moore clearly would have attracted more attention than Bullock. So the film's producers let the movie — not its star — do much of the talking. As soon as While You Were Sleeping was in a rough, unfinished form, Disney began showing it to critics, editors and reporters. It's the same strategy Paramount Pictures used to tout Ghost, TriStar Pictures followed with Sleepless in Seattle, and Twentieth Century Fox employed it to hype Speed.

"You don't have a marquee name and you certainly don't have a marquee director," says the film's director, John Turtletaub. "So all of the usual marketing tools are gone."

Last weekend, the film was shown in sneak previews in about 1,000 theaters nationwide. Disney says many of the previews were sold out, but following industry practice did not report grosses.

The film's no-star cast (and modest $15 million budget) does have its advantages, however: It gives the film "sleeper" status, which makes audiences (and journalists) feel they are finding something hidden. Because of its lightweight story, it's not likely to earn glowing reviews from the top critics. It will be driven by word-of-mouth.

"This is a film that if it becomes a success it's because America discovers it. We can't say, 'Here's Tom Hanks and Meg Ryan,'" Turteltaub says. "The movie is enjoyable. It's not impressive, it's hardly ground-breaking cinema."

Summer's biggest (and bloodiest) movies don't start arriving until Memorial Day weekend, which gives While You Were Sleeping several weeks to build. But the season's highest-profile romantic comedy, Meg Ryan and Kevin Kline's French Kiss, opens May 5. (Ryan starred in 1993's blockbuster Sleepless in Seattle).

If While You Were Sleeping wakes up an otherwise dormant box office, it likely will make "that girl who drove the bus in Speed" one of Hollywood's new stars. Unlike Stone or Moore, Bullock strikes many viewers as approachable; she doesn't generate awe.

"She most certainly is adorable — and she has charisma," Birnbaum says. "Guys would like to take her out and girls would like to be friends with her."

Within Hollywood, While You Were Sleeping is also seen as a test for producer Caravan Pictures. Formed in 1992 by Fox executives, Caravan has failed with a number of recent releases. Roth is now the chairman of the Disney studios, where the releases he inherited have mostly bombed.

Glam Rock examined in Notes

MTV premieres new show; Knuckle Sandwich wins 'Battle'

Glam Rock ... sigh.

Remember when how much hairspray you were sporting was just a important as the fiery licks you were tossing off on your hot pink, flying-V guitar? When real men wore leather and had ... er, perms, and screaming girls were the sole purpose of being in a good old rock n' roll band?

Yes, those days are gone, written off in rock history and filed neatly away somewhere between disco and new wave. Their only memory, tucked away in closets across the nation in the form of torn and faded pages from Rip and Circus magazine that once adorned bedroom walls everywhere. Now these pages have been replaced by pictures of such artists as Green Day and Pearl Jam, which have come from ... Rip and Circus magazines.

Where have they gone? The Warrants, The Dokkens, The Wingers, THE BANGO TANGOS! Well, if you really need to know it looks as if The Strand in Providence, R.I. has become a haven for those pseudo-bad boys who told us it was cool to grow long hair, hang in pool halls and ride Harley's.

The next month's worth of lineups at the Strand includes Strutt, who bill themselves as New England's No. 1 cover band and look like the guys from Boston did their hair. Cinderella — yes, Cinderella — the band who held an open audition for a new drummer and still only managed to get a few hundred applicants. Great White, who perfected the art of disguising horrible music by putting a ton of scantily clad women in front of the camera. Also appearing will be Dokken, who were probably last reported being seen on some cable access show in middle America somewhere.

But one of the more surprising shows that took place had to have been the appearance by Skid Row. Led by Sebastian Bach, the man inappropriately named after a good musician and composer, who acts like he grew up the toughest guy in his high school, but looks like if he fell into a boxing ring between Donny Osmond and Gary Coleman would get pummelled. I'm not sure what reflects the current state of America more, the fact that someone will still book them, or that the show sold out.

So what does this mean? Maybe that even in the post-Nevermind '90s there is still a market (and perhaps now a growing cult) for mindless metal and pretty-boy posturing. Hey, disco made a comeback.

Has MTV finally lost its mind? If you got near cable TV this past weekend you got a chance to see what has replaced "Headbanger's Ball" on Saturday nights.

Well, it's called "Superock." Let's all say that out loud to get a better feel for it ..."Superock." Hosted by some woman who hides in the shadows and throws questions at rock bands while they stand in the spotlight, "SuperRock" (it's so hard to say that without laughing) attempts to present a mix of heavy metal and alterna-rap — ie. Cypress Hill, House of Pain, with very poor results.

Sure maybe "Headbangers Ball" only appealed to a small audience, but at least Riki Rachman had a good rapport with the bands and seemed like he fit in with the scene. He gave the show an identity, now it's just the equivalent of watching "Alternative Nation" — "SuperRock" is just Metal "lite."

Lastly, congratulations goes out to local favorites Knuckle Sandwich for winning last week's "Battle Of The Bands" held in the Student Union Ballroom. The group will bring their wacked-out brand of "folk–ska–rock–whatever" to the Spring Concert stage when they fill the opening slot.

HC performance to focus on AIDS

By Wendy Darling
Collegian Staff

The Hampshire College Red Barn will present an "HIV+ punk rock love story" as Collin Chace delivers a solo performance of Rock N Roll (We Vanish Quick) tonight, April 22 and April 23.

Rock N Roll is sponsored by three Hampshire College groups, the Queer Community Alliance, Health Services, and Hampshire Independent Productions.

The performance begins at 10 p.m. tonight and tomorrow, and at 2 p.m. on Sunday.

Written by Chace, Rock N Roll will demonstrate many aspects of AIDS, including the way identity can become overshadowed by disease. The central character loses his punk culture, his community, and his lover to AIDS. He becomes filled with rage as he attempts to "preserve and reclaim" his identity, said Chace.

"The urgency of fighting AIDS is put across to the audience through the presence of loss," Chase said. "When rage is gone, that is where loss lies."

Chace says he hopes Rock N Roll will wake people up to the "idiot compassion" of many "HIV–liberals."

"What passes as compassion is often degradation with a pretty smile," he said.

Instead of battling AIDS by forcing the government to sponsor more research, many people are simply taking care of the infected, the sick, and the dying, Chace said.

"I wrote this piece in part to tell of my stories and experiences, but also because I needed to create a space in which compassion — in its true form — could survive," said Chace.

Proceeds will be split between the Hampshire AIDS Action Collective and the ACT–UP / New York AIDS Cure Coalition.

According to ACT–UP, the project is designed as an "all– out effort to find a cure" for AIDS and is included in the AIDS Cure Act currently being considered by Congress.

Rock N' Roll will performed at the Hampshire College Red Barn tonight, April 22, April 23. Tickets are $2.

Mexican officials fail to appear, delay peace talks

By Joseph B. Frazier
Associated Press

SAN ANDRES LARRAINZAR, Mexico — Government negotiators failed to show up Thursday for the first peace talks in over a year, put off by the hundreds of peasants who set up camp in town to show support for guerrilla leaders.

The night before, angry government officials had warned the surprise demonstration by rebel sympathizers could jeopardize the peace process.

"The fight goes on!" throngs of Indian farmers in sandals and straw hats shouted when the rebel negotiators arrived Wednesday night. "Long live the Zapatista National Liberation Army!" Although there has been no fighting since January 1994, the government's failure to end the Zapatista rebellion in the southern state of Chiapas has contributed to the sense of crisis in Mexico over the past 16 months.

Last month the two sides agreed to meet in San Andres Larrainzar for their first formal talks in more than a year, to be held in a hastily constructed building on the dusty town's basketball court. Talks were to have begun Thursday morning.

Interior Minister Esteban Moctezuma said Thursday the government had the "political will" to achieve peace in Chiapas, but he would not comment on the delay, the official Mexican news agency Notimex reported.

Notimex said government negotiators in nearby San Cristobal de las Casas were seeking a "suitable climate" for the talks, but the pro-rebel outpouring was holding things up.

Late Thursday, federal congressman who helped organize the talks left town, saying they may return later. They did not elaborate on the status of the talks, but issued a statement saying conditions guaranteeing the security of negotiators on both sides "must be strictly complied with."

The Zapatistas began the uprising Jan. 1, 1994, to demand greater democracy in Mexico and better social and economic conditions for Indian peasants in Chiapas, the poorest state in Mexico. About 145 people were killed in 12 days of fighting before a cease-fire was declared.

Johnson said. The ALANA Video Project is open to new ideas and will provide you with necessary crew members to help you shoot, according to Johnson.

Johnson, an accounting major, stressed that the AVP exists to help ALANA students who are interested in learning more about the communications industry. "The ALANA Video Project is not just for communications majors," Johnson said. "It is good for any major."

According to Johnson, UMass students should take advantage of the AVP because "not too many other schools offer opportunities for students to get hands on video production skills" and because "college is the only time you get to do these things."

The effectiveness of the ALANA Video Project is not to be underrated, as many members of AVP have gone on to "great internships and paid jobs in the industry." Obed Alce, one of the founders of AVP, cited his own internship with SONY Music Studios in New York —which turned into a permanent job position— as well as other members who have worked with CIGNA, HBO, and CBS.

When asked to sum up what the ALANA Video Project was all about, Alce said that It offers new opportunities by "Taking television production to new heights."

For further information on the ALANA Video Project, contact Obed Alce at 546–0749, Sonia Bawa at 546–3151, or Monique Johnson at 546–7084.

WHAT ARE YOU DOING THIS SUMMER?
Summer School? Job? Internship?
The Collegian will have opportunities on how to pass those summer months.

Gutridge making an impact

By Candice Flemming
Collegian Staff

Freshmen aren't expected to come in and make an immediate impact.

But this freshman was.

Ask Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino if she expected freshman first baseman Kim Gutridge to make an immediate impact and she responds without hesitation.

"Absolutely, absolutely," she said. "I told everybody all summer long when I went around to all our alumni meetings that we had a great player coming in."

Great player is an understatement.

This great player not only is the team's leading hitter (.370) or the team leader in doubles (12), but she currently has a 17-game hitting streak, second highest on the team this season as sophomore Sam Cardenas hit safely in 22 straight games. During the hitting streak, Gutridge is batting .528 (24-53) with 10 runs scored and 13 runs batted in.

While to some players a hitting streak and individual statistics might be all they think about, to Gutridge, the hitting streak comes second to the team's success.

"I don't think about it," said Gutridge. "I think it's good that it's happening, but I don't think about it because if I would think about it, then I know I'd ruin it.

"I think we're doing really good [as a team]. I think we have everything it takes to be down there for the Final Four. To make it there, for me as a freshman, I think would be awesome."

Gutridge's hits haven't been meaningless, either. They've come in clutch opportunities.

In Tuesday's sweep of Central Connecticut, Gutridge got the biggest hit of the day. With the score tied at 1-1 in the bottom of the eighth, Gutridge came up with two outs and teammate Kelly Buckley on second. Gutridge responded by hitting a single past the second basemen to drive in the game-winning run.

Then today, with UMass down 1-0 to UConn in the bottom of the seventh, she led off the inning with a base hit up the middle, but her teammates failed to knock her in. In the second game of today's double-header against the Huskies, Gutridge went 3-for-4 with two RBIs and one run scored, while smashing her 12th double of the season over the right fielder's head to drive in a run.

For the season, Gutridge has 44 hits (second only to Cardenas' 45) and 22 RBIs. She's not too shabby in the field, either. The "true" lefty has a team-high .977 fielding percentage.

To Gutridge, playing so well so soon isn't a surprise. To her, it hasn't been that big of an adjustment, it's still just playing softball.

"I've been, playing-wise, stepping up to the level of college, to me it's the same [as high school]," she said.

One thing that Gutridge didn't expect was that her outstanding talent would lead her to becoming the first player in UMass history to be selected to the USA Junior National Team. The team will be competing in the World Championships in late June and early July.

"There's not too many kids in the country that are playing on that all-world team that she's on this summer and that's why she's there. She's a great player," Sortino said.

"[Being selected] meant so much to me," Gutridge said. "Just trying out was awesome. I didn't expect to even make it because they were all so good. There's so many players and just to make it, it's an experience that I'll never forget."

The fans that will be in attendance for the World Championships will get a chance to watch a first baseman that they may never forget.

Celtics prepare for final Garden party

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Boston Celtics say goodbye to the Boston Garden tonight, playing their last regular-season game in an arena that is as much a part of Celtics' lore as the leprechaun and the parquet floor.

The team still is in the hunt for a playoff spot and a likely Eastern Conference matchup against the Orlando Magic, but its last certain home date is a game against the New York Knicks.

Bob Cousy, the Celtics' legendary guard, plans to be in the stands. He knows he'll have a hard time walking out the door. "Everybody sees something different when they look at that building. I look at it and see a beautiful time of my life," said Cousy.

During the 1946-47 season, Cousy and his Holy Cross teammates played several home games at the Garden en route to their NCAA basketball championship.

Three years later Cousy spent his wedding night playing a game for the Celtics.

And in March 1963, when Cousy played his own final regular-season game in the Garden, a moment of quiet was shattered when a fan yelled out, "We love ya, Cooz."

Cousy, now a Celtics broadcaster, said: "I know intellectually it has to go down, but I will shed a huge tear when it does." The Garden is following a trail blazed by the Chicago Stadium last year.

The 67-year-old building will be shuttered in September and its prime tenants, the Celtics and the Boston Bruins, will move next door to the FleetCenter. It is a $160 million, state-of-the-art arena like Chicago's new United Center.

four runs on four hits, including two doubles and two singles to go along with a UMass error.

The Minutemen regained the lead, picking up a run in the bottom of the fifth and exploded for four more in the sixth, sparked by a two-run double from Pileski.

The Hawks were not able to produce anymore offense, as junior David Dart came in to hurl three and a third scoreless innings to ice the victory. In three games versus Hartford, including two last season, Dart has compiled three wins with one earned run.

"I don't think it had anything to do with the team," Dart said. "I didn't do anything different, I just felt confident and things went my way."

Although there was no problem creating offense for the Minutemen in the contest, Stone was not totally pleased with his squad's performance defensively.

"It was a sloppy game for us in the field," Stone said. "But when you're a good team, you win those games when you're sloppy."

The Minutemen are back in action this weekend at Lorden Field against Rutgers in a battle for first place in the conference. Game time for Saturday's double-header is noon.

Marcus Camby is still attending class this semester, and he has continued to hit the books. If you knew you had a job waiting for you for next year, and you did not need the schooling, would you still be doing your work?

Didn't think so. And let's just hope I am right.

• Canseco is the man. But then again, that's what I thought about Jack Clark when he came to the Sox.

• Finally a home game for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team that the fans will actually go to. The No. 14 Minutemen will host No. 11 Notre Dame tomorrow afternoon at Richard F. Garber Field (1 p.m.).

Poor scheduling has hurt the fan support so far this season. Not poor scheduling as in the opponents' strength, because Greg Cannella's boys play against the national powerhouses — the Virginias, the Hofstras, the Dukes, and the like.

But the timing they play at, and the travelling they've had to do, has put Minutemen lax on the back burner here on campus. Five of the first seven games have been played on the road. The first home game was during spring break on March 25, also the same weekend as the men's hoop team played in the Final Eight. The other home game was on Easter weekend (April 15), a time where many students head home for the religious holiday.

So now, barring any untimely happenings, Mike Valente and friends might actually see some fans on the hill.

It's about time.

• The Bill Bayno–Chris Herren show, possibly coming to a hardwood near you.

• Mark my words. The Minutemen need a recruit to become the new floor general. If they don't get a talented point guard, the importance of Derek Kellogg will be realized in a painful way.

That would probably be the only way Kellogg could get the credit he so deserves.

Andrew Bryce is a Collegian columnist.

people that are very important to them."

While lacrosse does not have the same tradition as some other sports as Notre Dame, the mystique that surrounds the entire athletic program is not lost on Cannella.

"There's sort of a mystique going out to Notre Dame, but they're coming to us, and its a little bit different," Cannella said. "There is a mystique with Notre Dame. It's a very intriguing match-up on paper."

This will be only the fifth time Massachusetts has faced Notre Dame in any sport, and the first meeting in lacrosse. Three of those meetings coming this year. The two schools split a two-game series in ice hockey last December, while the Fighting Irish defeated UMass in the women's basketball NIT in March.

Game notes: Tomorrow's game can be heard live at 1 p.m. on WMUA, 91.1 FM, and will be shown on tape delay on Continental Cable.

Well, the last time I saw her at the high school, she told me she was flunking algebra.

Softball splits double dip with UConn

By Andrew Bryce
Collegian Staff

ROB BARRETT / COLLEGIAN
Freshman Kim Gutridge extended her hitting streak to 17 games against Connecticut yesterday. See related story on page 8.

When the University of Massachusetts softball team plays a doubleheader, you may see two different teams. They will be the same players and the same coaching staff, but different outputs will be produced.

Yesterday afternoon, the Minutewomen (25–14) dropped a 1–0 decision to Connecticut (20–14), and then banged out 12 hits in taking the second game, 7–4.

"Feast or famine, it seems like these days," Massachusetts coach Elaine Sortino said.

These days include a 10–0 win in the first game of a doubleheader and a 4–1 loss in the second game against Rutgers on April 14. It includes last Tuesday's 2–1 win in the first game against Central Connecticut, and a 9–1 blowout in the second.

"It seems like the last three outings, we either get one or two runs, or a million runs," Sortino said. "I was truly disappointed with the team in the first game, they really pressed. UConn didn't hurt us as much as we hurt ourselves."

The first game saw one player cross the plate, in the first inning, but not without controversy.

Huskies' outfielder Andrea D'Innocenzo led off the game with a single. Third baseman Stephanie Mason bunted D'Innocenzo to second base. After a Sandy Sanford groundout back to the pitcher, first baseman Karin Muller nailed one to right field. Minutewoman Heather Dorsey came in and put a glove on the ball. The umpire called it a trap, and D'Innocenzo scored the only run of the game.

Sortino disagreed with the call.

"That run did not score in the first inning, that ball was not trapped," Sortino said. "I'm sending [the umpire] the tape, that's for sure." But she was quick to add, "Then again, we didn't score any, so that's how it goes."

UConn pitchers Jennifer Wardwell and Bridgett McCaffery combined to spin a three-hitter. Wardwell got the win (5–2), while Minutewomen Kelly Daut received the loss (16–6). The setback was the first for Daut in 10 games, as the loss ended her nine-game win streak. She was solid, giving up five hits while letting up one earned run, a walk and nine strikeouts in a complete game.

As the first game ended in frustration for Sortino and Co., they had to prepare for yet another one.

"I was drained after that first game. We had to turn it all around, and load up again," Sortino said.

Massachusetts did just that. A third inning barrage put the Minutewomen out in front. After scoring a run in the first after a Sam Cardenas walk knocked in Michele Shaw, who singled, Chris Martens began the third with a single. Kelly Buckley got a bunt single, and Kim Gutridge singled to knock in a run. Shaw then banged out yet another single, and was followed by a Daut double that brought home two more runs. Cardenas managed to knock another run, making it 5–0.

Dani Ortega was pitching a perfect game heading into the fifth inning, before letting up a homerun to Muller. Ortega gave up three more runs in the sixth, but the Minutewomen already had seven runs on the board.

"She did a good job," Sortino said. "In the fifth inning, she started to let up a bit. What I was glad to see was she came back in the seventh, and got it done."

Knight crowned as HR king

By Mike Brown
Collegian Staff

The forecast at game time was mostly sunny, highs in the 60s, and records likely to be broken. It was a great day for baseball, and an even better day for senior Bill Knight.

The University of Massachusetts baseball team may have defeated the Hawks of the University of Hartford, 15–5, but the highlight of the day came from the big stick of Knight, who jumped on an 0–1 pitch and crushed it over the left field fence. The dinger was his ninth of the season, which broke the UMass all–time homerun record at 33.

"I wasn't really thinking about [the record] when I was up at bat," Knight said. "I was looking for a pitch I could handle, he hung a curveball and I got a good piece of it."

Knight has been on a tear this week, hitting homers in three consecutive games. Prior to Monday, Knight had been on a cold streak, with his last round tripper coming on April 1. Many people had been anxiously awaiting his record– setting stroke, according to Knight.

"A lot of people were harping on it, asking if I was going to break it sometime soon," Knight said. "I'm just glad I finally got it done."

That homerun included a package incentive, as the three RBIs accompanying the blast made Knight the all–time leader in runs batted in as well with 136. Knight has now become part of the history books in UMass athletics and the homerun king has done something he'll never forget.

"It hit me when I shook [assistant coach Mike] Laga's hand," Knight said. "I was like wow, unbelievable, I felt so good."

With a good portion of the season remaining and the Atlantic–10 tournament approaching, Knight said it was nice to get the monkey off his back and not have to worry about breaking any records.

"It's nice to see him break it now," UMass coach Mike Stone said, "So he can relax and get to hitting."

Knight's homerun, however, was not a deciding factor in the victory as the Minutemen (20–8) were already comfortably ahead, 12–5, before his appearance at the plate.

Trailing in the bottom of the first, 1–0, UMass jumped all over Hartford starter Frank Barresi for five runs on five hits. Freshman Muchie Dagliere walked to get the first runner on base. Junior Nelson Ubaldo doubled, sending Dagliere to third. Knight followed suit, doubling into left field, scoring Dagliere and Ubaldo. Senior Andy Pelis was then awarded a base on balls, putting runners on the first and second bags.

Junior Mark Pileski then hit a single, loading the bases for sophomore Nate Murphy, who kept it going with a line shot single, scoring Knight and advancing Pelis to third. Junior Justin Kelly hit a sacrifice fly, scoring Pelis, before sophomore Brad Gorrie singled to plate Pileski, finishing out the scoring in the first.

UMass held a four–run lead until the top of the third inning when the Hawks knocked Minuteman starter freshman Scott Bamsby for

Vegas opportunity could be Bayno's ticket to big time

What a difference a year makes.

There Bill Bayno was, circa 1994, an assistant coach in a program on the verge of becoming one of the elite teams, applying for head coaching jobs in the New England area. Making himself available to Boston University and Northeastern, only to be rejected for one and backing off another because he knew he was not the final choice.

And now, just one year later, Bayno is head coach at the University of Nevada Las Vegas, making some $300,000 a year. Bayno's base salary is higher than John Calipari's here at Massachusetts. Gulp.

Around the Horn with Andrew Bryce

Now some are going to say how it may be a bad move to a scathed basketball program. Some say Bayno is in for a tumultuous time in Vegas. But here Bayno is, a 32–year old Calipari–disciple looking to rebuild a former elite program. He was here at Massachusetts when the program was built from scratch, and he had much to do with the reconstruction. Bayno has the capabilities to get it done.

What will Massachusetts miss most about Bayno? Recruiting, a Bayno specialty. But as the Massachusetts program blossoms, the faces will change. It's a given that players like Lou Roe and Derek Kellogg are moving on out into the real world. But what is not realized at times is how Bayno is making the same move. Bayno was schooled as an assistant coach, and now he is ready for the next step. It's a promotion for Bayno.

And say what you want about UNLV. Dig up the articles on the Runnin' Rebels and the trouble they have experienced in the past. But realize there is a future, one that can erase the recent dark times and replace them with bright ones. And chosen to lead them out of the mess is a Massachusetts alum (1982) and former assistant coach Bill Bayno.

That's nice to see.

• You couldn't pay me enough to play in at third base in a softball game when there is a righty up at the plate.

• While the spring sports teams are enjoying fine seasons, the talk of the UMass sports world is of Marcus Camby. Is the sophomore center for the Minutemen going to go hardship, and enter the 1995 NBA Draft? Will he follow Joe Smith, Corliss Williamson, Gery Trent, Scotty Thurman and other underclassmen to the pros?

There are many factors in a decision, namely personal financial matters, the proposed rookie salary cap that may begin next season, the risk of injury while in school, etc. What does Camby think about these things? What's his call?

Who knows?

As for me, I think Camby will stay. And I think that for one simple reason.

Lax needs to play like champs vs. ND

COLLEGIAN FILE
Senior captain Jared Lanning and the Minuteman defense will have their hands full with a potent Notre Dame offense tomorrow.

For the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team to make it to this year's NCAA tournament, it will have to "play like champions" for the final five games of the season, starting tomorrow against the school that invented the concept.

The Fighting Irish come to Richard F. Garber Field with a record of 6–3, and hope to extend their current winning streak to six games. Notre Dame has not played since last Thursday and should be fresh for Saturday's game.

Massachusetts coach Greg Cannella predicts that the layoff will have Notre Dame pumped up for this Saturday's showdown.

"I expect them to come fired up. They've had 10 days off. They'll be well rested coming in here," Cannella said.

The game is particularly important for Massachusetts (4– 3). With their dream of post season play hanging in the balance, the Minutemen are focused on winning the remainder of their games to ensure themselves a bid.

When the team left the field after defeating Harvard, they chanted "Five and 0," in unison during their post–game huddle.

"At the beginning of the season it's 12 and 0. Now we have to try to win five in a row. We can win all five and we can lose all five, it depends on how we come ready to play," Cannella said. "Saturday is a big day for us, playing No. 11 Notre Dame. It gives us a real good chance to get back into the top 10, where we think we are."

Cannella said that his team has to play its style instead of worrying about the Irish.

"[Notre Dame] is very well coached," he said. "We just have to come out and play our own game. I expect a great game."

Fifth–year senior attacker Randy Colley has been the offensive leader for Notre Dame so far this season with 28 goals and 16 assists on the season. The senior is currently Notre Dame's career leader in goals (152), assists (91) and points (243) but the Irish defense has been particularly impressive as well.

The unit anchored by All–American Mike Iorio has held its opponents to under eight goals a game. Freshman goalie Alex Cade unseated two–year starter Ryan Jewell from the starting job and has played well in his six starts.

Cannella pointed to Cooley and Iorio as the keys to Notre Dame's success.

"They have probably one of the best attackmen in the country, and probably one of the best defensemen in the country," Cannella said. "Those two guys are going to

Postseason awaits water polo

The University of Massachusetts women's water polo team will travel to Harvard University this weekend for the Eastern Water Polo Association North Division Playoffs.

This will be the Minutewomen's first ever appearance in the playoffs as a varsity sport. Saturday afternoon in their first round game at 1 p.m. UMass will take on Wesleyan University.

Massachusetts coach Bob Newcomb is anticipating his team to play good solid games all weekend.

"If we can get into the championship game this weekend, than I think that we made a huge accomplishment in this one year," Newcomb said.

If the Minutewomen advance to the second round, they will play the winner of the first round Brown/Bowdoin match–up on Saturday evening. Brown is expected to be one of Massachusetts' toughest opponents in the playoffs.

"Brown will be a major game for us," Newcomb said on the probable matchup. "They are nationally ranked and just coming off a big win against Harvard, who is ranked ahead of them."

Newcomb speculated that Brown could be overlooking UMass as a possible threat in the second round. "This is a big time game for us and we're hoping to change their mind."

Massachusetts enters this weekend's playoffs with a record of 7–1 against teams in EWPA. Also, with an overall record of 4–1 against the teams in the field this weekend, the Minutewomen are hoping to use this advantage to advance to the Eastern Championship, which will be held at Brown University from April 28–30.

Sophomore Vicki Bamond continues to be UMass' biggest scoring threat. Bamond leads Massachusetts in scoring with 42 goals and 12 assists.

After having a slow start against tough Californian teams, the Minutewomen have improved offensively as the season has progressed.

While defenders have keyed in on Bamond, other UMass players were forced to step up on offense and seven have reached the 20 point mark this year.

Junior Mirca Martinez is behind Bamond in scoring with 29 points (21 goals, 8 assists), followed by junior Michelle Hanningan with 27 points (18 goals, 9 assists).

Sophomore Barbara Hickey (15 goals, 7 assists) and junior Meghan O'Conner (12 goals, 10 assists) have each scored 22 points, and juniors Heather Saunders (12 goals, 8 assists) and Barbara Mullen (9 goals, 11 assists) have 20 points apiece.

Minutewomen set to play Vermont

By Allison Connolly
Collegian Staff

It could prove to be anybody's game this weekend when the universities of Massachusetts and Vermont clash in women's lacrosse action in Burlington, Vt.

Both are coming off big losses in the past two weeks. The Minutewomen have had some close games against common opponents and are hoping for a victory against the Catamounts.

The Minutewomen (2–7) are coming off a tough loss to Hofstra on Tuesday, losing after being tied at 10–10 until the Flying Dutchwomen scored on a penalty shot with only seven seconds remaining on the clock. UMass held the lead at 10–7 with 7:17 minutes to go but could not keep the advantage. Hofstra came back to edge UMass by one goal.

However, Vermont was defeated by Hofstra by a large margin, with a score of 18–10. Although Vermont took a 5–4 lead in the first half, Hofstra quickly closed the gap and prevented the Catamounts from getting it back in the second half.

Vermont also lost to Rutgers, who defeated UMass 6–4. The loss to the Lady Knights was attributed to the Minutewomen's lack of intensity beginning the second half.

For the Minutewomen, the Vermont game will be played very similar to their games against Hofstra and Rutgers. If they follow their game plan and remain consistent, Massachusetts will be successful, according to UMass coach Francesca McClellan.

"Our challenge is to get a lead and keep it," McClellan said. "We need to go out and play hard and strong for two halves. In the last game, we did what we needed to do, by coming out strong at the beginning of both halves. But we felt the pressure in the end and gave into it."

Against the Catamounts, UMass must work on handling that pressure. The Minutewomen have been successful in breaking their habit of playing a strong first half and coming out timid in the second. Their improvement was most noticeable against No. 3 Dartmouth, when UMass only gave up two goals in the second half. Most of this success could be attributed to a brilliant team effort that included good passing and communication skills.

Freshman goaltender Kate Brew has had an impressive debut in her first collegiate season, holding the fourth highest save percentage in the country.

The strengths of Vermont include aggressive shooters and midfield speed. However, UMass could capitalize on the fact that Vermont has not performed well in their last few games.

"We have the advantages of shooting power and sharp goaltending," McClellan said. "All we need to do is pick up the slack and responsibility."

The Minutewomen will miss the talents of sophomore Michelle Warrington, who suffered a knee injury in Tuesday's game against Hofstra. Warrington leads UMass in ground balls and is a solid defender.

Lou Roe's number 15 to be raised to rafters

By Justin C. Smith and Matt Vautour
Collegian Staff

Last night at the annual men's basketball awards banquet, Massachusetts coach John Calipari announced that the best player he ever coached would be joining the best players ever to play at the University of Massachusetts in the rafters of the William D. Mullins Center.

Senior forward Lou Roe's number 15 was retired last night. A framed jersey was presented to the Atlantic City native at the ceremony and banner displaying the 15 will be raised to the rafters alongside Julius Erving and George Burke's 32s at a later date.

"I can give you numbers. I can give you stats, I can give you wins. But he was the greatest player I ever coached," said Calipari, who broke down and cried during the announcement. "We're going to retire his number tonight."

Roe came to UMass as the first marquee player to become a part of Calipari's rebuilding process.

"It's been great playing here for four years. Everybody who is a senior can look back in the future and have great memories like I have," said Roe after Senior Night. He reiterated that sentiment last night. "The best decision I ever made was choosing to come to the University of Massachusetts."

Roe received three other awards at the banquet including the rebounding, scoring and team MVP.

During Roe's four seasons at Massachusetts, the program advanced quickly into the national spotlight. In his final season, the Minutemen received their first No. 1 ranking and advanced to the NCAA tournament's Final Eight.

The 6–foot–7–inch forward will leave UMass as the school's all–time leading rebounder with 1070. He also averaged 14.2 points a game, including 16.5 in his senior year.

Roe was the 1994–95 Atlantic 10 Player of the Year and is the only player to be named to the conference's All– Tournament team four consecutive years.

Roe is expected to be selected at the NBA draft in June.

Notes: The Boston Globe reported the sophomore center Marcus Camby is expected to remain at the University for another season. There has been considerable speculation that Camby would bypass his two remaining years of eligibility to make himself available for the NBA draft. No official announcement has been made yet ... According to Calipari, Jeff Meyer has been receiving interest from and could possibly play in the United States Basketball League next season ... Brooklyn native Jamel Watkins, a 6–foot–9–inch forward whom UMass has been recruiting, is expected to announce what school he plans to attend sometime today.

Chomsky examines controversial issues

News Analysis

Today's world is in deeply–troubled waters, and it may seem like the future does not hold much hope for global amelioration. In the New World Order, this "new world" is ambiguously old and is not at all in order.

This concept and its implications for all Americans was evaluated in Friday's lecture by M.I.T. professor Noam Chomsky. Although he apparently came with an organized agenda, Chomsky touched upon many different subjects, all of which enlightened to some degree or another the enthusiastic crowd.

He began by examining recent news articles and exposing the biased, stereotypical and incomplete information that is therein released — the most recent example being the automatic assumption that the bombing in Oklahoma City last week was undoubtedly orchestrated by some kinds of Muslim "fanatics" or "madmen."

Chomsky attributed the source of such assumptions to the "really effective system of indoctrination in the United States," since "the extent of obedience to dogma" has always remained on the increase in this country.

The lecture, titled "Democracy and Markets in the New World Order," encompassed a three–tiered methodological approach: examine what "new opportunities" the New World Order has brought; reveal the "serious challenges" that lay ahead; and finally, analyze the role of the United States as the sole, omnipotent leader of this New World.

Retracing through the historical origins of this New World, Chomsky recalled the writings of one of the founders of the theory upon which capitalist societies have been constructed, namely, Adam Smith. Smith was one of the first to speak on the consequences of imperialism, Chomsky said.

Bringing it back to the present time, Chomsky spoke of the "double–edged doctrine of markets, what is now called neoliberalism ... [resulting in] public subsidy for the rich and market discipline for the poor." This indeed is what makes up the "North/South divide," also known as the demarcation between the First and Third worlds.

Both the North and South each have symbolic exceptions; In the latter case, it was Japan that experienced development because it developed instead of maximally exploiting its colonies, said Chomsky. The Northern exception is the Republic of Ireland, "whose development was barred by vast protectionism," he said.

The role of the United States in the global economy has been pivotal in the course of the New World Order. According to Chomsky, the U.S. has in fact materialized England's (and other European powers') initial goal of establishing a "two–tiered society" of poor and rich. The base to this strategy has been to maintain "state power in the hands of those that control state society," Chomsky said.

If this is true, what then are the means by which the US government has achieved this? With fear, Chomsky told the audience. Since World War II, state intervention increased tremendously, which made the American public even more politically homogeneous. It was the Lecture portrays art as cultural resistance

By Sanuber Deniznen
Collegian Correspondent

The fact that we can communicate anything and everything through art is what makes it a very strong and effective tool in conveying messages, particularly in a cultural context.

The power of art was made clear by the exhibition of different artists' works on Friday at the Campus Center in a lecture titled "Cultural Practice, Cultural Resistance." Approximately 20 people attended the lecture.

The series of conferences were under the banner of "Marxism and the politics of anti–essentialism." They were sponsored by the Association For Economic and Social Analysis of the Economics Department at UMass, and hosted by Rethinking Marxism, a monthly journal.

"Cultural Practice, Cultural Resistance" focused on the works of various artists that tried to convey something about their lives, beliefs and ideologies.

Rethinking MARXISM Campus Center, April 21-22

Danielle Abrams and Lisi De Haas, two San Francisco– based artists talked about what it is like to be a member of an underground community in a district mainly shared by Latinos, queers, and artists.

The video produced by De Haas, Recipe For Grief, dealt with the story of a person named Angel who moved to a small town in the midwest without a gender, but is considered to be male by the male–dominated society.

When they find out that his body resembles a female body more then a male body, he is bashed and killed.

"Horror and beauty is very much the point of my work," De Haas said. "I come from a tradition of art that is very formal, and I find a lot of my exploration duality centered around gender."

Abrams talked about her biracial identity, and her video, "Sonny," about the lesbian relationship between her lover and herself.

Susan Minnich, a political activist and artist who has worked in graphic arts in New York, said that in working as a graphic artist she found out how the credentials she was lacking affected her work. She said she learned that she had to discover what art was all about.

"I want to make art that matters, that works as a method in changing things," Minnich said.

The last speaker, Robert Blake, an artist who works in a museum in New York and teaches photography at UMass, talked about his work with Joe Rodriguez, a Latino photographer from Brooklyn.

Together they made a video of Latino and Mexican gangs in Los Angeles which they had photographed earlier. After five years they went back to these communities, revisited crack babies, grandmothers who are raising the sons and daughters of their children who died of HIV and AIDS– related illnesses, and people who had recently come out of jail because of past criminal activities.

"We wanted to see what they had to communicate to us," Blake said. "It is really incredible how some individuals improve their lives."

He finished by showing samples of his recent work, which consisted of photographs of African–American gangs in East Harlem. "I wanted to see what this life was about, how it was different," he said.

Earth Day '95 a success; sponsors gather support

MASSPIRG, local bands, vendors, and environmental groups celebrated Earth Day's 25th anniversary all day Saturday on the lawn in front of the Student Union.

The theme of this year's celebration was "Free the Planet," referring to the campaign and petition drive of the same name.

MASSPIRG set up a station to collect signatures for the petition, which had already received 2000 since the drive began at the start of the semester, according to Jen Mueller, a MASSPIRG intern.

The petition received 125,000 signatures nationwide and had set a nationwide goal of 200,000 more for Saturday, Mueller said.

The petition contains a 25–item list of environmentally conscious actions that the Free the Planet campaign hopes Congress will take upon receiving the petition. Mueller said the petition will be sent to Washington by July 4.

Local bands including Amanda's Dirty Secret, Noun, Synaesthsia, Darwin, and Peace Tribe entertained the crowd from a stage constructed in front of the Student Union steps.

Speakers from various environmental groups, as well as an unidentified person dressed as Dr. Seuss' "Lorax," took the stage inbetween bands to speak about environmental issues.

Marty Eisenberg, the staff director for Clean Water Action, encouraged the crowd to organize and let their representatives know how they felt about environmental issues and laws.

He warned the crowd that their involvement was crucial because politicians would "lie to save a little bit of money."

Clean Water Action is an environmental group that lobbies for stronger anti–pollution laws.

Clinton declares a day of mourning

By John Diamond
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton planted a tree of remembrance yesterday for the victims of the Oklahoma City bombing as his administration pledged to rebuild the demolished federal building and restore services.

On a designated national day of mourning, the president and first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton emerged from the White House, both wearing black, and walked hand-in-hand to the South Lawn.

They then took turns shoveling dirt into a hole prepared for the commemorative dogwood.

After standing silent for a few moments, they boarded a helicopter and departed for Oklahoma City for a prayer service in remembrance of those killed in the bombing.

Earlier Sunday, White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta, speaking on NBC's "Meet the Press," said Clinton will approve the rebuilding of the federal building in Oklahoma City that was blown up Wednesday.

"The president will make a commitment today that that building will be rebuilt and we will restore those services to the people of Oklahoma City," Panetta said.

Whether the services restored in Oklahoma City include a day care center located at the federal building remains in doubt, Panetta said later Sunday on CNN.

"We have about a 100 day care centers located in federal buildings across this country," Panetta said.

"As a consequence, however, of the increasing threat to federal buildings ... we need to look at whether day care centers should be located in those facilities."

Panetta also said the FBI and the Department of Justice are examining a point raised Saturday by House Speaker Newt Gingrich, (R-Ga.): whether they need expanded authority to infiltrate paramilitary groups.

"There is authority now to basically go after groups (where an) obvious allegation of wrongdoing is involved," Panetta said. "That's happening. The FBI is doing that."

But former FBI Agent Oliver "Buck" Revel said on CBS's "Face the Nation" that the federal government has limited power to monitor paramilitary groups and he advocated an expansion of that power.

"Mr. Panetta's statement that some of these groups are being monitored is inaccurate," Revel said. "I only left six months ago and we had no investigations on any of the militias. We certainly did on some of the white hate groups ... but these are not synonymous."

Defense Secretary William Perry, meanwhile, rejected assertions that the military was somehow unwittingly supporting paramilitary groups.

"I don't believe it is appropriate to couple the militia groups, the terrorist groups, with the U.S. military, and I very much resent any connection between the U.S. military and terrorist groups," Perry said on NBC.

As to the participation of active-duty U.S. military personnel in paramilitary groups, Perry said, "What military people do on their own time is not something we keep records of or maintain control of."

Robert Brown, the editor of Soldier of Fortune magazine, told NBC that no one knows how many people are involved in these groups.

"I don't even think even the federal government can come up with accurate counts," Brown said. "I would suggest in the tens of thousands."

the children who attended, including chalk and erasers for sidewalk drawing.

SEED is an organization made up of Mount Holyoke students who educate children about environmental issues and problems, according to Mitsty Voiles a SEED representative.

SEED was created to counter the "amount of corporate assault on kids today," said Voiles.

"We try to provide a balance, show other lifestyles that they can be a part of," she said.

Corporate sponsorship was something that the Free the Planet campaign and Earth Day tried very hard to avoid, Mueller said.

Food was provided by Classic Pizza, Sugar Jones Cookies, and chefs from the Butterfield dormitories.

"We're psyched," Mueller said, "the crowd's a revolving thing, but every time the buses stop, more people get off and come by, different people come by to see the different bands."

Several on-campus groups also set up tables providing information and activities, including the University of Massachusetts Animal Rights Coalition, Greenpeace and Earth First!

Space allocations announced by CC/SU

By Henry J. Brier
Collegian Staff

The Campus Center/Student Union (CC/SU) Commission met Thursday night after their meeting the previous long– weekend. Having completed discussing space allocation, the CC/SU released the results of the allocation process.

According to the CC/SU Commission 1995 Preliminary Space Allocation, nearly eighty Registered Student Organizations (RSOs), Graduate Student Organizations (GSOs), and agencies are listed, some of which were not given space, another of which is fictive.

The commission is the "governing body" of the CC/SU Complex, according to Matthew G. Auger, commission chair.

Of the 78 organizations listed on the document, nine were granted "no space," and a note at the bottom read: "Any group not listed has not been allocated space."

One group, the Stick in the Mud Club, was the hypothetical name used by the commission in discussion during past meetings about the snags, conditions and circumstances expected to arise in the space allocation process. They were placed in Campus Center room 817, office of the CC/SU Commission.

The avenue of appeal for organizations not pleased with their assigned space will begin at this Thursday's meeting, Auger said. The appeals process includes a ten minute period when the group can present before the Commission any issues they may have with their preliminary space assignment.

In related commission business, Auger said that the budget he requested from the Student Government Association (SGA) for Fiscal Year 1996 was approved. The total is an increase from last year of almost $5,000, to be covered by revenue provided by commission accounts.

Also, the commission voted to table discussion about graduate student Colin Cavell's resolution against privatization of University food services until this week.

"There are some things in here that could be biased," said Claudia Prodan, undergraduate member of the commission. "It wouldn't be wise for us to vote on this."

Cavell acknowledged that there is a bias aimed "against privatization." As a student at a public institution and a commission member, he said it is his responsibility "to look after student concerns." He said the approval rating for food services is over 50 percent, thus no change is needed.

Auger said "the building is falling apart," and privatization would "renovate the whole thing."

Additionally, the commission held officer nominations for elections to occur this week.

Cavell nominated Auger for chair, and he will be unopposed. Auger nominated current vending officer Esther Salas for the same position, citing the "leaps and bounds" the commission has taken "with Esther at the helm." Undergraduate member Sonali Bajaj nominated Prodan for food service officer. Jennifer Hall, undergraduate member and current facilities officer, nominated herself for the position she currently holds, and will face a challenge from Bajaj, who was nominated by Prodan, representing the only politically competitive race for officer in the commission.

"Pentagon system," Chomsky said, that gave the American people "security instead of subsidizing" — the result being the taking of power from public hands and putting it into private hands, and the immediate rise of private corporations.

More recently, the role of the "American savior," first played by Ronald Reagan, is now portrayed in Newt Gingrich. Chomsky cited the legislation passed under the latter's rise to power as indicative of this, both NAFTA and GATT provide an international license for American global continued domination.

Such key pieces of the New World Order grant patent rights for industrialized nations in which "cuts [in] growth and development" are being "rammed down the throats of the Third World as part of tough love," said Chomsky. The Third World, which in reality encompasses two-thirds of the earth's land mass, continues to provide for the raison d'être of Western fear of foreign invasion.

According to Chomsky, 75 percent of the weapons owned by developing nations are provided by the Western industrialized countries. Thus, the West in fact does have a potential enemy — an enemy it literally created.

Inside American borders, the conservative revolution continues, embodied in the Contract With America — nothing more than "welfare for the rich." For example, he said prison building, while displayed as an act of toughening crime laws, has moreover turned into a thriving industry which acts "as a big way of ripping off public funds."

In this dichotomized "real world" and "ideological world," he said, the ruling principles by which the New World Order is run are not at all new. Americans, as representatives of the most powerful nation in the world, face "an ominous future" unless they are willing to decisively take a stand against the rapidly-growing status quo.

"Unless we are willing to understand ourselves, there is no way that we can understand the world," Chomsky concluded.

Losing identity behind the labels

Nathan Crick

I want to make a movie called "Allies."

It would take place in San Francisco, and would be about a bunch of young multicultural friends trying to come to terms with the discord of the world. Every character would embody all the stereotyped characteristics and problems of each group they represent. Then through a series of conflicts and revelations, all of the merry band would learn to love the differences with each other. Ultimately, they would learn to think that every person in the world that belong to each cultural groups acts, thinks, and has had experiences that are exactly the same, and really are pretty neat people once you learn to categorize them.

Then at the ending of the movie, they would all be sitting around at a cozy cafe, and one of them would say to them all, "boy, I'm glad you're all my allies!" and they'd raise their cups in the air and that would be the freeze frame. Then the Spin Doctors would start playing.

Many people live in a very happy place. It must be nice to believe a huge amount of people have suddenly become your friends all due to the fact that you have checked off another box on the "Who are you an Ally of?" survey. Maybe they have made a friend, or heard a lecture, or discovered some newfound struggle inside that immediately identifies them with a whole bunch of people who apparently have struggled a lot.

In the Collegian, I read that a Jewish-lesbian writer had said "that her oppression led her to become an ally of African-American people because they experienced similar acts of discrimination." Apparently, only African-Americans are lauded this boon of her friendship, and all the other oppressed groups of the world will just have to wait. After all, you cannot be an ally to everyone at once, can you? You must focus on one, and make that your token friend.

The people of the world have been thrown a lifeline for their insecurity. It is called "stereotyping." It is a revolutionary term that means you take every person, including yourself, that falls within a certain cultural or ethnic group, and you attribute to them a set history, and a set personality, and a set moral code. Then individuals will not matter because they are one of a million, and that is too many people to learn. Look at the faces, and smile at their visage, because by definition you have already called them "friend." Or, if it's easier, call them "enemy." Whatever feels better. It's all the same.

So the movie keeps on filming, and more people keep applying for the parts. Leaders stand up and say their "We [insert group name] are all committed to [insert cause]." People stand up and say "I am a [insert group name and sex] writing about [name] in this society." We have voluntarily jumped into our self-made boxes, and look at the world through the tinted windows and make our remarks as a something rather than a someone.

It is the effect of breaking up the subject of "Human" in a tree diagram that splits off into a thousand different categories. Then when we look at our problems, we concentrate on defining the categories rather than understanding the subject. The fact is, whatever cultural group we belong to, our behaviors and our beliefs and everything that we perceive is a result of our common characteristic of being human, and all these external things that we define ourselves by or attach ourselves to will not change that.

The problem arises when we lose the true meaning of being an individual. This idea itself has been twisted to mean some superficial value of being "different," which usually culminates in attaching oneself to some obscure fashion. Being an individual has nothing to do with being different, and it has nothing to do with the groups we belong to. It simply means facing up to the fears that we think about at night, and the dreams we have and are afraid to say, and the shame we absorb when we keep them all inside and go from day to day reciting our lines.

We must learn what it means by giving up our illusions of somehow being "different," and dropping ourselves step by step back down the tree diagram until we reach the final base. Then, finally, we will realize that we are nothing more and nothing less than part of this overwhelming history of fragile things called "humans," and that almost anything we think of and anything we do has already been done before. We are nothing new. The world is old and laughs at our self importance. It laughs at our petty anger, and our token understanding, and our ignorant pride.

But that's too hard. It's too much. Call me something else. Let someone else define me to make me something more. Give me a defense of my existence, and give me a reason to fear, and a reason to be angry, and a reason to hope, and give me everything so I can hide inside this box, and be sheltered from the winds and the weather and the truth of my own being.

Then the credits will role, and I can watch the screen with a dumb smile and be content with the part I have played.

Nathan Crick is a Collegian columnist.

Dreaming while your body bumbles on

Emily Marino

"Gimme four more," my aerobics instructor yells. "That's four, three..." Right about now I'm thinking that two more knee lifts might just kill me.

Most of my friends think I'm insane for waking up at 7 a.m. every Monday, Wednesday and Friday to crawl to Boyden Gym for an aerobics class. Some mornings, I think they're not so wrong.

I signed up for this aerobics class last semester with one of my housemates, who later decided 8 a.m. was way too early to be out of bed, much less exercise. The first day of class I was happily surprised to find another friend stretching out on the red, matted floor in the room. Finally, someone who understood the value of starting the day with some rigorous physical activity (out of bed). Her stay in Aerobics Land did not exceed two classes. Mine seems to be eternal.

Waking up as early as I do does not bother me, once I'm on the bus and sure that I remembered to put on all my clothes. A huge benefit of working out first thing in the morning is your brain can stay asleep while your body bumbles along to the music. Then you're done for the day, and don't have to worry about exercising after everything else you have to do before nightfall.

I'm not the most coordinated person in the world, so synchronized exercise is probably not the wisest way for me to work out. Throw some music into the picture, and my concentration is about as good as on gorgeous spring days I try to study outside. One morning, I was so busy trying to figure out what song we were aerobicizing to, one of my two instructors had to bounce over to show me that I was doing the exercise wrong, and bring me back to earth. This was the only time I've ever seen either instructor leave the front of the room.

Sometimes I giggle. Everyone in the class is pretty good about keeping up with the routines, and I would be the last to laugh at anyone else's motor skills in light of my own. It just strikes me as funny, at times, that a dozen of us are lined up, jumping up and down, with our arms and legs flailing about in the pursuit of physical fitness.

I wonder what goes through everyone else's mind during the class, and think about how strange we must look to passers-by.

Then there is the problem of Friday morning. Some students uphold a theory that the weekend begins on Thursday. Though my Thursday night adventures are few and far between, there is an occasional Friday morning that I would rather lay in bed and wait for the man with the sledgehammer in my head go back to sleep or die.

I usually make it to class to find that most everyone else (including the instructors) is in just as rough shape as I am. On these days we do calisthenics. Push-ups, sit-ups, leg and butt-lifts are a lot easier on the hung-over body than jumping up and down to a blaring backbeat.

In all truth, think that exercise is vastly unappreciated in our society. The American lifestyle consists of sedentary activities featuring television and beer. This is especially true of the way we regard athletics. When was the last time you watched any kind of sport on TV without a cold one in your hand? The popularity of sports bars is proof of this trend.

As our beer guts get bigger, perhaps our fear of exercise increases as well. I took an aerobics class my first year here, and had a few reservations when I signed up. I thought the instructors would be narcissistic, Barbie-like fitness fanatics whose lives revolved around working out. I figured everyone in the class would know exactly what they were doing, and get irritated if I screwed up the routine or, heaven forbid, crashed into them.

What I found in that first class was nothing like my hardbody-esque nightmare. The student instructors were down to earth people who explained the routines and what muscle group was being used during each exercise. We took heart-rate counts and made sure that we were exercising properly. The students in the class weren't necessarily any more coordinated than I was, and, like me, were there to do something positive for their health.

My experience this year is similar, though my current classmates are more chatty about what's going on in their lives. People talk about their housing situations for next year, weekend plans, and why, on Fridays, they would really rather do calisthenics.

There is a weird bond, I think, between people who work out together, even if they don't know each other well. Pushing yourself and realizing your own limits with a bunch of people who have the same goal can create a connection that may otherwise never exist. From my own experience, I think it's fair to say that sweating and smelling funky at practically the crack of dawn helps, too.

Respect due to opposing views

Evan Young

At UMass, the land of PCness, many issues are touchy subjects. Issues of race, homosexuality, gender and environment are continually talked about in classes or fought for in rallies. This would all be well and good, but there is a big problem here. People are unwilling to hear any view but their own.

I strongly believe that a case can always be made for the opposite side of an argument. No matter what the issue, no matter who it will aggravate, one person's opinion is no more or less important or correct than another's. Everyone has a right to be heard. The only problem is that no one is willing to listen.

There are many problems with this campus. One of them is political correctness. If someone were to say, for example, that homosexuals should be banned from the armed forces and give an argument upholding this view, they would instantly get 100 angry UMass students down their throat.

What is going on here? Are people so caught up in their own views that they are not willing to hear the other side of the argument? The inarguable answer is yes. Political correctness has become more than a fad, it has become an obsession. It seems like everyone is trying to change everything, never stopping to turn right and left, and ask themselves what the other side thinks.

Saying this, I don't just mean that people don't see the other side of a few particular issues, but almost any issue whatsoever. On this campus you either think pro-women, pro-minority, pro-homosexual, pro-environment, pro-animal rights, pro-this-or-that, or your opinion means nothing. You're just another ignorant fool if you agree with what is "wrong" and don't agree with what is "right."

So, my questions are these: Who is to say what is right and what is wrong? If everyone agreed on everything, where would we be right now? The human ability to communicate is what sets us apart, but the human ability to argue is what is really powerful. Disagreement breeds enlightenment, agreement breeds stagnancy.

But to this, a lot of people would say, "Well, what other arguments could there possibly be in opposition to the many groups who are fighting for equality, or for a higher standard of living?" There must be many arguments against it, or else these groups would no longer be fighting, but would be equal in stature in our society by now. Maybe those arguments are wrong in one persons view but to someone else, they may be right. The fact is that for every opinion that you might have there will be someone out there with a different one. To use a cliche, there's no such thing as a wrong opinion.

So homosexuals should stay out of the army, more of the rain forest should be chopped down, and non-English speaking people shouldn't be allowed into this country. Maybe that's what I think. These are not horrible statements; they are just particular points of view.

Angry? Not PC? On the other hand, maybe that's not what I think, but I say it to point out the problem with narrow- minded activism on our campus. If these views piss you off, then stop and ask yourself "why?" Pause and think of this: Many other people would agree with me. What I just said is not necessarily right, not necessarily wrong, but it is necessarily an opinion. In any argument, the way the other person looks at it is just as important as the way you look at it.

What I say may be totally wrong, but too many people around here at PCU are not listening to what others have to say, and are waving their banners under the guise of pro- this-or-thatism.

So who can truly settle the issues that seems to be taking up so much time around here? Who can answer the questions of race equality? How about gender equality? The rights of trees and cows? Historians can. Biologists can. Psychologists can. Anthropologists and Philosophers can. Everyone can. I can, you can, he can, she can, and they can.

Do you think that all these people will agree? Is it necessarily bad if they don't?

Letters to the Editor

Columnist should face her own music

To the editor:

In her Op-ed piece, E.C. Thomas takes on the world of rap and makes broad sweeping comments about the mediums "endorsement" of certain lifestyles. I am not shocked at Thomas' blatant ignorance about the importance of rap in Urban Contemporary culture, and her borderline racist assessment of the issue. I, however, am in shock that Thomas singles rap out, in light of the fact that rock & roll has never had a record of "endorsing" positive lifestyles, or creating positive role models.

Thomas writes as if Kurt Cobain, Jim Morrison, The Grateful dead, Primus, and Guns and Roses do not epitomize the rock and roll creed, "Sex, drugs, and rock and roll!" The reality is that rock has and continues to advocate alternative lifestyles, entertainment, and activities. That could be questioned if you had the right wing's check list as to what is right and wrong, as Thomas must have.

Thomas says that "music has always been an outlet for teenage angst," and rushes over the fact that in the inner cities, angst isn't allowance problems or early curfews, or parents that don't understand your needs (as well as other problems in suburbia.) In the inner city, angst is drive by shootings, no jobs, a broken school system, police brutality, and parents who would like to know what their children are doing but work far too long to even talk to them. So I am not sure why Thomas would not see why the outlet would reflect this angst.

As for Eazy-E and his AIDS related death, I question Thomas' comment about how "no doubt countless others in the genre have contracted the disease or died of it." I hope Thomas is referring to the genre of music and not just the genre of rap for you have to cite a few facts in there to back up your statement, unless Thomas would have us take her narrow minded perspective as truth. I have to say that Thomas should be more careful in talking to the issues of AIDS.

The impact of AIDS on our generation has been intense, and that is precisely why we should take every death as yet another lesson, but at the same time be pro-active in the prevention of it. If Thomas had used the space to educate us further on the state of aids today, instead of mocking Eazy- E's last message it would have been far more constructive.

So if Thomas wants to give virtuous lessons to us in the rap listening community and go on tirades on how rap artists should express their lives and their culture she needs to get a better understanding of the genre, its roots, and its origins, and not just rely on the sound byte, ABC, Connie Chung, and uninformed, main stream lies that are fed to us daily. Most importantly, she should check out her own CD collection for music that promoter "violence and promiscuity." Because I will concede to Ms. Thomas that rap created this environment of "bullets, bitches, 40-ouncers, and attitudes of fuck the police," only when she will agree that rock and roll created what the right wing has called a "poverty of moral values, and an intellectual decline of our youth."

State supports recycling effort

To the editor:

A lot has happened to improve our environment in the 25 years since the first Earth Day. Great progress has been made in cleaning up our air, our rivers and our drinking water, protecting our farm land and endangered species, and preserving our wetlands and open space. Everyone — consumers, business, government, everyone — has had a hand in making recycling, especially in Massachusetts, a great environmental success story.

According to the state's 1994 Solid Waste Master Plan Update, state residents have done such a good job of recycling that we are well on the way to reaching the Department of Environmental Protection's goals of diverting from landfills 34 percent of its solid waste stream this year and 46 percent by the year 2000. That's impressive, considering that statistics from 1988 show that a mere 10 percent of the total solid waste stream was being diverted at that time.

And now the state is supporting that effort by funding, for the first time, recycling market development. By investing $5 million from unredeemed bottle deposits, the state is working to close the recycling loop by helping businesses explore ways to use recycled material in their manufacturing processes. With this money we can begin to transform our successful recycling collection program into a multi-faceted economic development program that will give us the twin benefits of a cleaner environment and more local jobs. That $5 million is also financing such community-based efforts as composting and household hazardous waste clean-up programs.

Recycling is just one part of the effort to save the planet. But it's a significant part, one that everybody can feel good about every time they celebrate Earth Day by tossing a can, a bottle, or an old newspaper into the recycling bin instead of the trash can.

Revealed art is window to past

Famous paintings lost after war rediscovered in Russia

By Suzanne Garb
Collegian Staff

News Analysis

Art has long been said to mirror nature. The recent rediscovery of artwork thought lost for 50 years is a call to people everywhere to realize that the effects of World War II and the Holocaust are still being felt today.

Last March, 74 works of art were presented in the Hermitage Museum in St. Petersburg, Russia. All of the pieces in the collection "Hidden Treasures Revealed" were thought lost at the end of World War II. The collection includes artwork from both the impressionist and modernist movements, including such artists as Van Gogh, Monet, Renoir and Picasso, among others.

The Soviet army took custody of the works from Nazi bunkers at the end of the war 50 years ago. The collection remained well hidden and carefully preserved until nearly half a century later when they were presented in St. Petersburg.

Controversy has arisen about the art's ownership. Russia and Germany are debating who should have possession of the works. Fifty years after the end of the war its effects can still be felt in areas ranging from world politics to art.

However, the concept of museums' housing paintings and other forms of art obtained during war is not a new idea.

War booty comprises a good percentage of collections in other international museums.

An example is the large amount of Egyptian art in the Louvre which was taken by Napoleon after he invaded Egypt in the late 1700s.

The rediscovery of these works is monumental in the art world. When paintings are stolen from a museum, it is a painful loss for art lovers. Seventy-four works that were once thought to be a casualty of war are back in the public's eye, to the delight of many.

In Germany, it is still as though both the war and the Holocaust happened just last week. In the United States it is easy to view the war as an American victory. The buildings destroyed by the many bombings are absent from the American landscape.

As the years pass, and the number of living World War II veterans and Holocaust survivors diminishes, we must remind ourselves of the horrors of the war. We must find ways to remind ourselves that we can never let this tragedy happen again.

The history of these works being hidden is a permanent part of the legend of these paintings. It is an indelible link to the time of Nazi Germany and whenever these pieces are viewed it will not let the works be forgotten.

The joy of rediscovering this great collection must force us to reexamine the sorrow of World War II and the Holocaust.

Holocaust deniers use devious tactics

Jacob W. Michaels

When I arrived at the Collegian office last Friday, I was surprised to find an unmarked manila folder in my mailbox. Inside said folder was couple of short "opinion pieces" by Bradley R. Smith.

Smith is the director of a group called Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust, and one of the foremost Holocaust deniers, or "revisionists" as they call themselves.

The first thing we might think about these people who try to deny the fact that a Holocaust occurred is that they're pretty stupid. Unfortunately, these men are instead deviously intelligent.

They time their packages very carefully. They know that Holocaust Memorial Week begins today, so they sound out their materials at a perfect time for them to be printed this week.

They also target college campuses and newspapers. They feel that they can prey on the students, who may feel that they have to print this material. And they do their work well.

The first of Smith's editorials, titled "Intellectual Freedom and the Holocaust Controversy," deals with this issue.

He writes that Jewish journalists are under pressure from the "Holocaust Lobby to betray, not only their ideals as journalists, but the long tradition of intellectual liberty ..."

By doing this, Smith hopes to get even students who do believe the Holocaust happened by saying they are betraying the ideals that journalists believe in, namely free speech. It is a tactic that has worked well in the past, as many campus papers have printed the material, including Brandeis, a Jewish school.

An idea as ridiculous as Smith's does not need to be presented. According to renowned Holocaust historian, Deborah Lipstadt, debate about issues like abortion and gun control are important because there are diametrically opposed viewpoints on the issue. However a debate about whether the Holocaust, one of the most well-documented events in history, occurred is ridiculous.

People like Smith are often frustrated that they can not get others to debate them. They know that this would help legitimate their ridiculous notions. Instead, Smith and his ilk have taken to attacking Lipstadt and others who believe in the truth.

The second of his editorial pieces, ostensibly about the Holocaust museum, spent more time attacking Lipstadt and Michael Berenbaum, the former projects manager for the US Holocaust Memorial museum.

He belittles both Lipstadt and the Holocaust itself in subtle ways. He does this by calling those who believe the obvious truths to be a cult, and the "Lipstadt/Berenbaum clique." He described the Holocaust Museum as "glimcrackery," whatever that might be. As a final insult to not only all those who believe the truth, but to Jews in general, he describes such people as "quasi religious zealots."

What these deniers never tackle are the written accounts left by the Nazis themselves, much less what was seen by those who lived through the Holocaust and fought in World War II. Diseased minds like Smith's will only become more prevalent as actual survivors die and can no longer tell their accounts. That is what makes hearing these people and having this week of remembrance all the more important.

It is a sad fact that we must remain vigilant as these people try to manipulate others for their twisted agenda. As more witnesses to the actual events die, they will continue in their efforts to twist the truth, preying on impressionable students and their desires to do the right thing in printing their lies.

Commemoration events are planned for Five College area

■ Survivor Judith Isaacson leads discourse of different generations

By Lisa Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The official day of remembrance for the Holocaust — Yom HaShoah in Hebrew — is Thursday, April 27.

Every year the Hillel Foundation commemorates this day with a week of programming in cooperation with the University of Massachusetts, Amherst and various campus groups.

Holocaust Memorial Week will be observed this year from Tuesday, April 25 through Thursday, April 27.

This year, events being planned include a panel discussion with three generations of people affected by the Holocaust, three films, a commemoration service, a poetry reading and a speech by an Auschwitz survivor.

Chair of the Holocaust Memorial Week Planning Committee, Gita Mann, said the week is important because, "by taking time to study a major tragedy in the past, we will be more aware and work towards preventing them in the future."

Mann and Hillel Program Director Yehudit Heller described the planning of the events of the week as aimed towards presenting a perspective that includes each generation affected by the Holocaust.

The panel discussion

On Tuesday, April 25 at 7:30 p.m. in the Hillel House, there will be a panel discussion about the impact of the Holocaust called "Three Generations in Mourning."

The panel will focus on survivors, their children and their grandchildren addressing the effects the Holocaust.

The four panelists will be Hedy Rose, Norbert Goldfield, Shlomit Shalfi and Erica Katz.

Film screening

On Wednesday, April 26 at 6 p.m., UMass professor Barton Byg's "Fascism and Film: Propaganda, Resistance, Memory" class will welcome the public for a screening of two films in Herter Hall, room 231.

The films, Intervals of Silence: Being Jewish in Germany by UMass alumna Deborah Lefkowitz and Half Sister by Hampshire College professor Abraham Ravett, are described by Byg as avant garde.

Byg described the Lefkowitz film as "a collage of voices" where the people speaking are never seen. Instead of people, the visual content is places and images of the German town Lefkowitz' husband came from.

Ravett's film, said Byg, "uses film to investigate how much can be remembered about the past."

This black and white film is about Ravett's half sister, whom he discovered had been killed in Auschwitz. Ravett's father was a Holocaust survivor who had a family that had been killed in the Holocaust.

Our children

The last Yiddish feature film produced in Poland, UNZERE KINDER (OUR CHILDREN), will be shown Wednesday, April 26 at 7:30 p.m. in the Campus Center, room 168C.

The film, created in 1948, "tells the story in docu-drama format of the wartime experiences and miraculous survival of a few children during the Holocaust period," according to the National Center for Jewish Film at Brandeis University. The area of Poland on which it focuses, was described as a "once vibrant Jewish community."

UNZERE KINDER was not allowed to be shown in Poland, because the Polish Communist Party didn't approve of its content.

Directed by Natan Gross and Shaul Goskind, OUR CHILDREN was restored after the original nitrate print was found in 1979. In 1947, Gross and Goskind collaborated in the making of the film with actors Shimon Dzigan and Yisroel Shumacher. All four men were Holocaust survivors.

The black and white film is 68 minutes in Yiddish with English subtitles.

Commemoration service

A campus-wide commemoration service will be held on Thursday, April 27 in the Cape Cod Lounge. This is the actual day of remembrance—Yom HaShoah.

Heller said the service will be lead by, and feature students, faculty and staff, reflecting on the impact of the Holocaust. It will include readings, poetry, a violinist performing, candle lighting and a moment of silence.

Heller, an Israeli, said "In Israel there is one minute of silence all over the country" where sirens sound, causing everyone in the country to stop and "think their own thoughts."

Poetry reading

The Hillel Israeli Poetry Class, taught by Heller, will open its class to the public. Those attending will be able to look into and explore poetry written during or inspired by the Holocaust.

The class will meet on Thursday at 2:30 p.m. in the Hillel House Conference Room.

Gracefulness and strength

Hungarian native and Holocaust survivor, Judith Magyar Isaacson, is described by Heller as full of "gracefulness and strength."

Isaacson is the author of Seed of Sarah: Memoirs of a Survivor. She is a survivor of Auschwitz and Hessisch Lictenau, a satellite camp of Buchenwald.

In 1994, Isaacson received an honorary doctorate from Bates College and was the 1993 recipient of the Deborah Morton Award at Westbrook College.

Heller said the inspirational nature of survivors' strength strikes her every time she meets a survivor. She said their resolve to keep going and their hope and energy are what she finds striking.

Heller said, "There is always strength, even in sadness and pain" and "surviving [the Holocaust] proves it."

Five College events

On Wednesday, April 26 at 7:30 p.m. in the Alumni House at Amherst College, and Thursday, April 27 at 7:30 p.m. in Wright Hall Auditorium at Smith College, a memorial service, followed by a speaker will commemorate Holocaust Memorial Day.

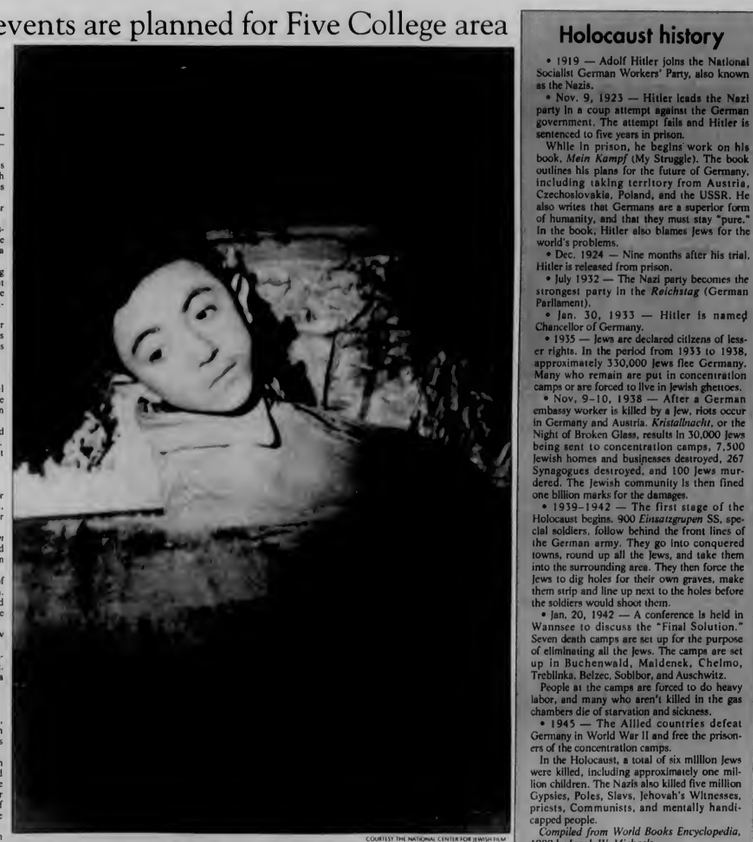
Holocaust survivor Hedy Rose will share her story of survival after a memorial service.

Rose was sheltered during the Holocaust with her mother and sister in the home of Christian friends. Four years living in an experience like that of Anne Frank. Rose and her family remained in the basement of their friends' home.

Rose lectures at Smith College, and has been an educator at Hampshire College and Wesleyan University.

All Holocaust Memorial Week events at UMass are free and open to the public. For more information on any of the events call 549-1710.

Sponsors of the week's events are: UMass Hillel, Five College Hillel, UMass Arts Council, UMass Student Affairs Cultural Enrichment Fund, UMass Student Government Association, Everywoman's Center, Office of Human Relations and the UMass departments of Judaic Studies, History, Germanic Language and Literature and English.



COURTESY THE NATIONAL CENTER FOR JEWISH FILM

UNZERE KINDER (OUR CHILDREN) directed by Natan Gross and Shaul Goskind will be shown this Wednesday in Room 168C of the UMass Campus Center. The film stars Shimon Dzigan and Yisroel Schumacher.

Holocaust history

- 1919 — Adolf Hitler joins the National Socialist German Workers' Party, also known as the Nazis.
- Nov. 9, 1923 — Hitler leads the Nazi party in a coup attempt against the German government. The attempt fails and Hitler is sentenced to five years in prison.

While in prison, he begins work on his book, Mein Kampf (My Struggle). The book outlines his plans for the future of Germany, including taking territory from Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and the USSR. He also writes that Germans are a superior form of humanity, and that they must stay "pure." In the book, Hitler also blames Jews for the world's problems.

- Dec. 1924 — Nine months after his trial, Hitler is released from prison.
- July 1932 — The Nazi party becomes the strongest party in the Reichstag (German Parliament).
- Jan. 30, 1933 — Hitler is named Chancellor of Germany.
- 1935 — Jews are declared citizens of lesser rights. In the period from 1933 to 1938, approximately 350,000 Jews flee Germany. Many who remain are put in concentration camps or are forced to live in Jewish ghettoes.
- Nov. 9–10, 1938 — After a German embassy worker is killed by a Jew, riots occur in Germany and Austria. Kristallnacht, or the Night of Broken Glass, results in 30,000 Jews being sent to concentration camps, 7,500 Jewish homes and businesses destroyed, 267 Synagogues destroyed, and 100 Jews murdered. The Jewish community is then fined one billion marks for the damages.
- 1939–1942 — The first stage of the Holocaust begins. 900 Einsatzgrupen SS, special soldiers, follow behind the front lines of the German army. They go into conquered towns, round up all the Jews, and take them into the surrounding area. They then force the Jews to dig holes for their own graves, make them strip and line up next to the holes before the soldiers would shoot them.
- Jan. 20, 1942 — A conference is held in Wannsee to discuss the "Final Solution." Seven death camps are set up for the purpose of eliminating all the Jews. The camps are set up in Buchenwald, Maldenek, Chelmo, Treblinka, Belzec, Soblbor, and Auschwitz.

People at the camps are forced to do heavy labor, and many who aren't killed in the gas chambers die of starvation and sickness.

- 1945 — The Allied countries defeat Germany in World War II and free the prisoners of the concentration camps.

In the Holocaust, a total of six million Jews were killed, including approximately one million children. The Nazis also killed five million Gypsies, Poles, Slavs, Jehovah's Witnesses, priests, Communists, and mentally handicapped people.

Mudhoney returns to form on new album

MUDHONEY
My Brother the Cow
Reprise

Mudhoney has always had that "live and die by the riff" mentality, which inadvertently became the main ingredient of grunge and thus, synonymous with Seattle. And while in this day and age most music buffs cringe at the word "grunge" or "Seattle," there is truth in the statement that a reliance on riffs is somewhat limiting. Luckily for us, Mudhoney could care less.

On their latest release, My Brother the Cow, Mudhoney stay true to their musical ideology and rock hard. This is a relief, considering that their previous effort, Piece of Cake, and split single with Jimmie Dale Gilmore hinted at a more pop-country oriented Mudhoney.

Trax On Trax Off

Now fully recaptured is the Black Flag angst, Stooges trip– psychedelia cohesion that was so apparent during their Sub Pop days. It's more of a treat then to see the band reunite with producer Jack Endino (Nirvana, Hazel, Skin Yard), who worked on the band's quintessential grunge record, Superfuzz BigMuff.

"Today, is a Good Day" is vintage Mudhoney with the one–two guitar crunch of Mark Arm and Steve Turner. "1995" is unquestionably a Stooges tribute as it bares resemblance in concept to "1969" and "1970," while its saxophone laden, trainwreck jam is reminiscent of "L.A. Song" off the Funhouse album.

There's also the ubiquitous Kurt Cobain reference on "Into yer Shtik," in which Arm sings, "Why don't you blow your brains out too? You're so into yer shtik ... you make me sick."

My Brother the Cow is without a doubt Mudhoney in top form. As cliched and unoriginal as their sound might seem, Mudhoney is one of the originals who made it cliche. This just might be the second coming of grunge. B+ (Wayken Shaw)

SUGARPLANT
Hiding Place
Pop Narcotic

Sugarplant is possibly the finest export to come out of Japan since the Sony Walkman. Most likely the band's impact on American culture will be nil compared to the Walkman, but that is unimportant. For the few who hear the band, they will be rewarded over and over again — guaranteed.

Musically, the most obvious reference point is Galaxie 500, but this album is more than just a tribute to their idols (Although the vinyl version of Hiding Place comes with a bonus 7" featuring a Galaxie 500 cover). Few critics will argue as to which is the superior band, yet Sugarplant does have one major advantage: vocals. Sugarplant's sound is augmented by the soothing and seductive voice of Chinatsu Shoyama.

Like any great dreamy pop record, all of the songs are woven tightly together leaving the listener surrounded by a collage of beautiful melody. The sum is greater than its parts here — no song alone is really outstanding. Together the songs create an entrancing mood that leaves the listener in a mellow state of mind.

To make everyday a special day, just try walking around campus listening to Sugarplant on your little Sony Walkman. B+ (Michael Burke)

WILD SEED — WILD FLOWER
Dionne Farris
Columbia

Message albums seem to be the hardest to swallow for music lovers. Many artists are so conscious of getting through to their listener, everything else (like listenabilty) is sacrificed for the good of the cause. Such is not the case with Dionne Farris.

COURTESY DAVID ROTH

Dionne Farris' debut album Wild Seed — Wild Flower is full of funk, blues and soul.

Funk, blues and a whole lot of soul wraps up this "message" package for palatability. Each song delivers a "pow" with a velvet covered fist hitting you when your back is turned. Her first single "I Know," steadily climbed the chart with it's cool mix of dance and soul. It's catchy and yet off–kilter enough not to be generic.

Other songs follow the same recipe for success. "Reality," "Food for Thought" and "Don't ever Touch Me (Again)" all carry some type of message — the off–balance of the world, facing life's challenges and the plight of battered women.

Farris is proud of her heritage and proud of her roots, this comes off very clearly in the album with songs like "Now or Later" and "Human." Even her cover of the Beatles' "Blackbird" takes on a new meaning as her voice soars around the lyrics turning into her own code for success.

You cannot help but admire the way she presents this pride without sounding pretentious or obtrusive. She simply states who she is and lets the music do the rest. B+ (Tara MK Connelly)

Asian night celebrates diverse culture, talent

By Jane Oh
Collegian Correspondent

12TH ANNUAL ASIAN NIGHT
Campus Center Auditorium
April 21

Friday night, approximately 1,000 people of all different races, nationalities and ethnicities joined in the celebration of Asian culture at University of Massachusetts' 12th Annual Asian Night.

According to Co–producer Mona SooHoo, Asian Night is not only a celebration but also aims to educate and make others more aware of Asians, the biggest minority group on campus.

"The great thing about Asian Night is that there are a lot of different races participating; we've learned a lot from each other," SooHoo said.

People had various reasons for attending Asian Night but they all seemed to share one common goal — to become more educated about Asian culture.

"It is important for Asian culture to be presented to a western audience because there's much to be learned from Asian thought and culture," said Craig Bliss, a geography graduate student.

Anh Ly, a security volunteer, was very impressed by the number of people who attended Asian Night. "It shows that this is a worthwhile and exciting event for the entire community, not just Asians," she said.

Many parents believed cultural events, like Asian Night, were important for diversifying children. David Aronow, accompanied by his 8–year–old daughter, Sarah Pearl, attended because, "It is important for me and my family to know about other types of people; diversity supports life."

Brian Sabel from Amherst, brought his daughter Rosa, because "it is critical for children to see and experience other cultures. People can learn so much from each other."

Asian Night began with the Lion Dance, a traditional Chinese dance, which was performed by the Boston Freemasons Athletic Club. A Korean fan dance was performed by the Korean Student Association. The dance is usually performed as entertainment for the presence of royalty.

"Months and months of practice, usually twice a week for 2–3 hours" had gone into their performance according to Ruth Kim, who participated in the dance.

Ji Lee, co–producer of Asian Night, sang two Korean love songs. He dedicated the first one to SooHoo, thanking her for all her efforts she put into the whole event.

One of the night's highlights was the performance of an Asian comedian. Christy Medrano has appeared on "In Living Colour," and has performed at top comedy clubs throughout the nation. Medrano joked about the strains while growing up and of living with her traditional Philippino parents.

Dancers representing Japan, Laos, Korea, China, Malaysia, Cambodia and Vietnam performed various traditional dances, often reserved for royalty and the high court.

Laos was represented in a 'Village Girls Wish Dance,' which is only performed for special occasions. The "wish" was for a fruitful year. Chinese dance was beautifully shown in a Candle Dance, performed to a French song, called "L is For Love." This dance is performed only at weddings and

Women's lax earns victory

By Jorma Kansanen

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN
The UMass women's lacrosse team defeated Vermont on the road this weekend.

BURLINGTON, Vt.—The forecast was for showers on Lake Champlain last Saturday afternoon, but it was the University of Massachusetts women's lacrosse team's offense that reigned, blowing out Vermont, 17-9.

Paced by seven different scorers on the day, the Minutewomen (3-7) poured it on offensively, which they have only shown a few times this season. Limiting the Catamounts (1-9) to three goals in the second half, UMass was able to bounce back from two losses this past week; one, to Hofstra University, and two, the left knee injury to one of their defensive standouts, Michelle Warrington.

To coach Francesca McClellan, the way the team played this afternoon was how she has wanted them to play all season, and they needed it.

"It was an exciting win, and finally a team win," McClellan said after the game. "Especially missing Michelle Warrington, who is such an integral part of our defense in the midfield. We had people really stepping up, and taking responsibility.

"It was definitely an offensive game, our scoring was once again really spread out, and well rounded. Which is a great indicator for the future, because anyone can score."

"I think overall we played really well, the entire offense and defense," sophomore defender Kristen Hocker said. "For the first time this year, we played the full sixty minutes.

"This was a real important win, just for the fact that we are good, but our record does not show it. We are young, but I hate using that excuse."

When sophomore attacker Stephanie Walsh's goal six and a half minutes into the first half, made it 3-2, the game was at an early crossroads. Both teams were not at the top of their games, but it was the Minutewomen who took charge. With freshman attacker Joanna Dignazio's tally at the 21:10 mark, the offense began to roll and the tempo was in UMass' control.

Until with 2:44 left, when Vermont scored two goals in the next minute and six seconds to shave the lead to 9-6. End of the half defensive lapses have been plaguing the Minutewomen all season, as the late run by the Catamounts transformed a large lead into a smaller one. UMass' midfield pressure was beginning to loosen up, but they were able to rebound quickly. With consecutive goals by Dignazio (24 goals, for 27 points) and freshman midfielder Vicky Nedomansky (13 goals, for 15 points), UMass was able to bump the lead back to five for halftime, 11-6.

Massachusetts	17
Vermont	9

Both of the high school All-Americans got hat tricks in the first half, but Nedomansky came out as the star of the day, stepping up with six goals for the game.

At the start of the second half, McClellan made a change in net, opting freshman Kate Brew for sophomore Trish DiBenedetto. It might not have been a major shift in their defensive zone strategy, but the switch worked as the Vermont players were being consistently fronted in the midfield and were repeatedly denied quality scoring opportunities.

The defense of senior captain Diane MacNeil, and sophomores Erica Bryan and Kristen Hocker, stymied the Catamount offense; more than making up for the absence of Warrington.

"We pressured them back in the midfield, to try to hurry their offense a lot more," McClellan said. "At the same time, our defense really stepped up to any kind of midfield connections, and it worked."

"I was not down lower on defense for most of the game. I stayed in the midfield and higher in the zone," Hocker said.

"The attack in the midfield pressured the ball a lot, and that helped. The more we pressured, the more we got the ball back. This just shows that we can not give up one minute, we have to play the entire game."

From there, the offense took over as the controlled passing from midfield to the offensive zone clicked the remainder of half.

Powered by four other scorers, MacNeil and freshmen Cindy O'Brien, Kristin Kramer (2 goals) and Kim Weaver (2 goals), the Minutewomen took a big mental step forward Saturday, making the score look much worse than 17-9.
